Editorial

We all know that times are changing, but, after the quickest two months I've ever experienced, I'm beginning to wonder whether time itself is changing, too. Change is certainly coming to print media in a big way. For example, the death of the newspaper is now being touted in many countries—and some say the death of the magazine will follow. Now, before I hear you say "But I will always prefer reading a paper or magazine with coffee", let me clearly iterate that this is not happening because of paper or magazine purchasing preferences by readers and consumers; it is being driven by the fact that people are using the Internet, instead of newspapers, for classified advertising. And for those who don't yet know this, a newspaper's real financial worth is the revenue derived from its classified advertisements. So when that dries up, you have either super-expensive newspapers or none at all.

The general-interest magazine categories, however, are dying. Why? Because in this information-flooded day and age, people are able, and prefer, to spend time on the specialised topics of their choice. And as for books, well, I think that it will be a long time before the sheer pleasure of snuggling up with a good book is replaced by reading it on a computer screen or having it downloaded directly into your brain via satellite.

Speaking of snuggling up to a good read, allow me to introduce you to some of the topics covered in this issue of NEXUS. First up, we have an article which reveals the slow path towards microchipping the population "for their own good". Although the day is not yet here, it is still worth considering what you will do in the future when you are told that you must be chipped—or be denied government and public services, i.e., not allowed to buy or sell, travel on roads, planes or trains, go to hospitals, schools, etc.

Next, we have a mind-boggling article on the latest developments with Codex Alimentarius. Codex is now more than just an assault on the natural health movement; it's an assault on the freedom to grow and eat natural foods. Yes, that's right: they want to remove vitamins and minerals from food sold commercially, and then irradiate the food for good measure. For those who are sceptical, consider that this already applies to milk from cows or goats in most western nations. You can milk the animal, but you cannot legally sell the milk unless it is pasteurised. In Australia, you are not even allowed to give raw milk away unless it has been "treated".

On the more positive side in terms of articles, we have an interview that addresses the "solution" to the problems above. Rather than fighting the "old system" (where you become that which you fight, anyway), millions of people around the world are creating a "new system", inspired by the writings and ideas found in the Ringing Cedars books from Russia. On a practical level, thousands of people are "going back to the land" and growing their own food and providing their own shelter, spreading love of the Earth as they grow. We hope to report on developments of this nature that are happening in other parts of the world in future issues of NEXUS.

As usual, there are many other important topics herein: a most interesting look at how and why the Earth "flips", "tilts" and "reverses spin" (sounds like a politician, doesn't it?); the latest Crop Circle season in the UK; and revelations by ex-NASA spacecraft operator Clark McClelland on how he watched an ET assist NASA astronauts on one of their Space Shuttle missions; and more.

Enjoy!

Duncan

Letters to the Editor ...

In Search of the Truth

Dear Duncan: I have been a long-time reader of NEXUS and enjoy it greatly. After reading the latest issue (15/05), I found three items that have compelled me to respond.

1) Page 9: "Biofuels Caused Food Crisis". Are people so stupid that they cannot make the connection between supply and demand? Why does it need the admission of a report from the World Bank (supposedly a trusted authority) for people to believe simple economics? If food crops are redirected to make fuel, then there is less for food! If there is less food in a given system, the price increases! I am not an economics professor or politician, so what would I know, eh?

2) Page 8: "Did Sichuan Quake Trigger Nuke Explosions?" What? How can a quake set off the complex procedure for a nuke detonation? And what's this I read? It was reported that "a non-geological shock had occurred at the earthquake epicentre". Er, excuse me, but don't you think it is the other way around? Just maybe the "non-geological shock" (nuke) was at the epicentre because it caused the quake? Hello! Nuke testing! Wakey, wakey!

3) Page 6: "Arctic Seabed Afire with Lava-spewing Volcanoes". Hmmm. Very interesting indeed. Er, excuse me, but isn't the Arctic...well, you know... being reported as melting at a far greater rate due to global warming? Well, hello! What happens when you put ice in a pot and heat it? Since when does atmospheric pollution cause volcanic eruptions? Clearly, the answer to the Arctic ice melting is underwater heating! Hello! Global warming due to our screwing with CO₂ emissions? Yeah, right!

What the hell is the truth?

Our Galactic Heritage

Dear Duncan: I have been very pleased recently to see NEXUS encompassing a very broad spectrum of interests. I particularly enjoyed "The Mitchell-Hedges Crystal Skull Mystery" and "Alien Memories and Dreams" in vol. 15, no. 4.

After reading the latter article by Brad Steiger, I felt comforted to know that many others have memories where they experience Earth in prehistoric times. I myself have written memories and stories of past lives on Earth that involved catastrophic changes as well as rescues by advanced beings not of this world.

These statistics that Brad and Sherry have gathered represent a body of information that seems, in my opinion, to substantiate the stories of many people who channel information and/or are "walk-ins" from alien civilisations.

Recently I have been exploring much of this type of information in respect to human galactic history. I've found great consistency from a wide variety of sources, each different star-system source filling in missing pieces of our prehistory as humans. And I am beginning to correlate the channelled information with ancient stories of star people reported by indigenous sources such as the African shaman Credo Mutwa, the Dogon tribe, the Mirning people in Australia as well as the more traditional Sumerian, Egyptian and Greek legends.

I believe it's time to start understanding our pan-galactic heritage in order to relate better to ourselves, our fellow humans and our extraterrestrial neighbours who are becoming more and more evident all the time.

I look forward to more articles along similar lines.

Aloha,

David P., Hawaii, USA

Prophecies for 2012

Hi Duncan: Love your work. I've been reading your publication for many years now and really enjoy the diverse and informative mix of alternative news you enlighten us lemmings with.

The reason I am writing is that a couple of years ago I read a series of articles in your magazine and in the New Dawn publication regarding the prophecies accumulating in late December 2012. As we are now only four years away from the prophecies' expected end-date, I was wondering what the chances would be of extracting from you a "special edition" of NEXUS dedicated solely to the various prophecies which have been circulating over the past 10 years or so.

I realise that you have a hectic schedule putting your magazine together in time for each issue, and if I were a hoarder I would have the past issues to review the prophecies (I generally pass NEXUS on to friends after I have read it from cover to cover). Unfortunately I'm not, hence this request.

Anyway, keep up the good work and, regardless of the outcome of this email, thanks for your time and consideration.

Kind regards,

Harry L.

[Thanks, Harry: I agree with you when you say that more and more people are talking about what might happen in December 2012, and, as you say, we still have four years to go! I don't really feel the need to do any such special edition in the near future, mainly because there is nothing really "new" to say. If, however, I discover new information that I think deserves special attention, then you will certainly read about it in NEXUS. Ed.]

UFO Disclosure Moves

Hi Duncan: Wernher von Braun made a number of predictions which were on the mark about the use of fear, the Cold War, rogue states and the War on Terror—perhaps not in those precise terms. However, he is quoted as saying the final card would be a "false flag" extraterrestrial attack as a way to weaponise space. I always thought that was not possible, since the US denies that extraterrestrials exist. So how can you have an attack if they don't "officially" exist?

Now we have the head Vatican astronomer saying that extraterrestrial life does not oppose Catholic doctrine. (There was a time when you'd be burnt at the stake for such a heresy.)

Now, former astronaut Edgar Mitchell has stated in the media that ETs exist and that the Roswell event was true. So there appears to be a climate of disclosure and mounting reports of UFO sightings in the media. If there is a disclosure, then maybe another of Wernher von Braun's predictions may come true.

Thanks, Duncan, for your hard work in informing us of the alternative news and views.

ETs and UFOs are Real!

Dear Duncan: Retired US astronaut Edgar Mitchell (the sixth man to walk on the Moon) has recently revealed that ETs are definitely real. He claims that he attended briefings on the subject whilst at NASA and that the US government and other governments have been hiding the truth about alien visitors from the populace for around 60 years. Mitchell says that he has many contacts who have interacted with small aliens similar to ET in the movie and that they are friendly.

I also remember that Buzz Aldrin, in a TV interview, claimed to have seen alien craft whilst he was on a Moon mission. Other astronauts also claim to have seen alien craft on the surface of the Moon.

I have never seen an alien (except my son as a teenager!) or a UFO but many other people from very reliable and credible sources have reported seeing strange craft in the sky over the last 60 years.

I feel that Edgar Mitchell, a highly credible source, is right that ETs do exist and that it is now time that all governments released the information to the rest of us.

Kind regards,
Rick P., Perth, Scotland

Exposing the Talmud

Dear NEXUS: Why don't you ever talk about the Talmud? What the Talmud says is far more interesting than far-fetched theories about the Mayans and Christianity—especially what it says about racial supremacy, human sacrifice (à la 9/11?) and much more.

It is the real secret religious text that is in plain sight yet is never ever talked about in public—lost in translation except to Hebrew speakers, who may not discuss it openly or honestly in public.

I suggest using the 1930s Soncino edition of the Babylonian Talmud, published before it was made politically correct. The original Hebrew version is not politically correct and is still recited as the original text; it's just not made public to western society.

It is a glaring omission from your magazine not to do a full exposure of the Talmud, which takes precedence over the Old Testament and therefore makes Judaism a totally different religion.

It has much more impact on current affairs than any of the other stuff you talk about, and is just as secret.

Anon.

[Dear Anon.: You may have noticed a spate of articles over the last few years which point out the lies and deceptions of various religions and their leaders, including the Old Testament, the New Testament, Sai Baba, the Papacy, Tibetan Buddhism, etc. It would appear that all organised religions are merely tools of social control. Don't worry; I still have several organised religions to go before we're finished! Ed.]

The Spin Effect

Dear Editor: I was just reading the article by Buryl Payne titled "The Biofield: A Different Type of Magnetism?", in the new issue of NEXUS (15/04).

The article reminded me of a book I read titled The Magnetic Blueprint of Life (1979), by Albert Roy Davis and Walter C. Rawls, Jr. Here is a quote from the book. "Generally, the scientific community has completely ignored the spin effect of matter, not only in protons, atoms, and quarks, but also in regard to magnetic fields." In Dr Payne's article he states: "Whereas magnetic forces only act on other magnets, this life force, or biofield force, apparently acts on all matter."

Well, according to Davis and Rawls, magnetism acts on all matter, too. They state that the positive clockwise energy (South Pole) expands, and the negative counterclockwise energy (North Pole) contracts, and that this is occurring constantly in all matter, everywhere. Davis and Rawls further imply that this means the universe is not expanding: it's expanding and contracting simultaneously.

The spin effect is very interesting. As Dr Payne says in the article, spin is found throughout the universe. Electrons spin around protons, planets spin around stars, stars spin around galaxies, and even black holes spin.

Anon.

Rife Machine Information

Hi Duncan: I was very interested in the letter in the last issue (15/05) titled "Rife Cancer Treatment Success". I have been researching alternative cancer treatments for some time and have collected quite a bit of information. I am absolutely convinced that three treatments are very beneficial against cancer: Rife, Gerson and, recently, Jim Humble's MMS. The problem with the Rife treatment is there are too many machines on the market. Some work and some don't.

I would be most grateful if you could provide some contact information for your correspondent regarding which brand of machine he purchased.

Many thanks,

Mike Ashby

[Dear Mike: Charles got so many emails and calls that we passed onto him that he is getting more for others. See his advert on page 48 of the Australian edition. Ed.]

KNIGHTS TEMPLAR HEIRS IN LEGAL BATTLE WITH POPE

The heirs of the Knights Templar have launched a legal battle in Spain to force the Pope to restore the reputation of the disgraced order which was accused of heresy and dissolved seven centuries ago.

The Association of the Sovereign Order of the Temple of Christ, whose members claim to be descended from the legendary crusaders, have filed a lawsuit against Pope Benedict XVI, calling for him to recognise the seizure of assets worth 100 billion euros (£79 billion).

They claim that when the order was dissolved by Pope Clement V in 1307, more than 9,000 properties as well as countless pastures, mills and other commercial ventures belonging to the knights were appropriated by the Church.

"We are not trying to cause the economic collapse of the Roman Catholic Church, but to illustrate to the court the magnitude of the plot against our Order," said a statement from the self-proclaimed modern-day knights.

The legal move by the Spanish group follows the unprecedented step by the Vatican towards the rehabilitation of the group when last October it released copies of parchments recording the trials of the knights between 1307 and 1312. The papers had lain hidden for more than three centuries, having been "misfiled" within papal archives until they were discovered by an academic in 2001.

VISION FOR A GLOBAL INTEL NETWORK

The US Director of National Intelligence, Mike McConnell, and the Council on Foreign Relations have made public a 28-page document, "Vision 2015", which outlines a plan to integrate the entire US intelligence network into a global intelligence community. Unsurprisingly, there are many in the 16 US intelligence agencies that support it.

McConnell stated: "By 2015, a globally networked Intelligence Enterprise will be essential to meet the demands for greater forethought and improved strategic agility. The existing agency-centric Intelligence Community must evolve into a true Intelligence Enterprise established on a collaborative foundation of shared services, mission-centric operations, and integrated mission management, all enabled by a smooth flow of people, ideas, and activities across the boundaries of the Intelligence Community agency members."

This mammoth global intelligence project has been under wraps for some time, and now the NGOs, members of elite academia and think-tanks, are going to unveil it as if it were a brand-new concept.

Our world has slowly been globalised from the economic sector to health, wealth and trade. They have taken the power from us, the people, and placed it in unelected non-governmental organisations, which has led to heights of corruption never seen before. The effects of IMF, WTO and WHO programs are well known, but just imagine the power and influence that will be wielded by those who will control spy satellites and command intelligence forces around the world.

LOW CHOLESTEROL INCREASES CANCER AND DEATH RISK

In a major shot fired across the bow of the statin-drug marketing machine, the levels of LDL [low-density lipoprotein] cholesterol that are the artificial targets of "health" promoted by the American Heart Association (AHA) have now been found to be associated with a significantly increased risk of cancer and death.

The AHA recommends an LDL level of 100 for prevention and 70 for high-risk patients. In the new study an LDL level of 107 was associated with a 33 per cent increased risk of cancer and death, and an LDL level of 87 was associated with a 50 per cent increased risk. As the LDL goes lower, the risk keeps getting worse. These arbitrary AHA levels for LDL cholesterol were established by "experts" with direct financial ties to the statin industry, who knew full well that reaching their artificially low target levels for LDL would require double and triple doses of statin drugs, thus dramatically increasing sales (which has indeed happened).

This new study paints the clear picture that lowering LDL too low actually increases the rate of death from any cause. It also points out the statistical shenanigans that the statin-drugs industry uses to hide the actual risks of these drugs in the studies that have been published.

There have been a number of studies in the past that link low cholesterol and cancer risk. However, these studies could not prove that the cancer was not already there prior to the start of the study—which has been the main argument used (besides statistical manipulation) by the statin industry to deny the association. In the new study, this issue was taken into account by eliminating participants with less than 2.5 years follow-up after the start of the study, thus demonstrating that the results were not due to pre-existing cancer.

Needless to say, this study was not part of the marketing machine propaganda that is rampant in universities and "scientific" journals that have been used to promote the statin scam around the world, while actively blackmailing and blacklisting any authors, institutions or journals that dare to step on Big Pharma's statin toes.

The study was published on 26 August 2008 in the Canadian Medical Association Journal (CMAJ).

(Source: NaturalNews.com, 27 August 2008, <http://www.naturalnews.com/024001.html>; the CMAJ article is at <http://www.cmaj.ca/cgi/content/full/179/5/427>)

HALF THE WORLD HAS A MOBILE PHONE

The number of mobile phone users worldwide soared to over 3.3 billion by the end of 2007, equivalent to a penetration rate of 49 per cent, the International Telecommunications Union (ITU) has said in a new report.

Africa showed the strongest gains over the past two years, and more than two-thirds of all mobile phone subscribers by the end of 2007 were from developing countries.

Mobile phones are eclipsing traditional fixed lines and in Africa they account for nearly 90 per cent of all telephone subscribers, the ITU report stated.

While developing countries have made great strides in mobile phone growth, a significant "digital divide" remains for Internet use and particularly the availability of broadband connections, it noted.

High-income countries account for 66 per cent of all fixed broadband subscribers although they only represent 16 per cent of the world's population, while developing countries have just one per cent of fixed broadband users but 38 per cent of the global population.

"Low-income countries, where broadband access remains very low, risk falling behind in an area that is particularly important in delivering innovative applications and services," the ITU warned.

Some countries have made progress and the ITU highlighted Chile, Senegal and Turkey as states where almost all Internet subscribers have now gone high speed.

"For more people to benefit from the potential of broadband and the applications that it can deliver, governments need to do their share to ensure that high-speed technologies become more accessible as well as more affordable," the ITU urged.

... GLOBAL NEWS ...

INQUIRY INTO PAN RAIDS

The Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd must initiate a formal inquiry into the Australian Therapeutic Goods Administration's use of fraud and lies to justify its 2003 corporate terror raid on Pan Pharmaceuticals and the wider natural and traditional healthcare product industry, says analyst Ron Law.

Australian Federal Court documents reveal that Therapeutic Goods Administration (TGA) officials embarked on an orchestrated litany of lies, falsified evidence and shredded documents, and fraudulently claimed that there was an "imminent risk" of death and serious harm, despite knowing that its expert advisory committee had concluded there was no serious risk.

Officials even falsified the advice of the Solicitor-General during a briefing to the then Australian Prime Minister.

The New Zealand government initiated a mandatory recall of hundreds of safe products in New Zealand in May 2003 on the basis of Australia's deceit and fraud.

NZ Prime Minister Helen Clark and Kevin Rudd must now formally consign the much-maligned (proposed) joint Trans-Tasman Therapeutic Goods Administration to the history books.

The revelations in the Australian Federal Court resulted in the Australian government paying out millions of dollars to the majority shareholder of Pan Pharmaceuticals.

Industry sources suggest that claims by the rest of the Australian and NZ natural and traditional healthcare product industry will reach over A$200 million in further payouts, with NZ companies preparing claims against the Australian and NZ governments.

The TGA's vindictive behaviour extended to New Zealand regulators. Companies that opposed the proposed joint agency were subject to unwarranted, random GMP (good manufacturing practice) audits that in some cases cost companies six-figure sums. This also requires investigation.

The one positive to come from the Federal Court revelations is that some of the reasons for Australian and NZ industry's contempt and disdain for the Australian regulator have now been formally revealed.

"There is no place in a modern democratic society for a regulator like the Australian Therapeutic Goods Agency," says Ron Law. "Mr Rudd, do the decent thing and establish a formal inquiry to unearth the extent of the regulatory malfeasance and then provide Australia with an honest regulator, fit for purpose."

IMF LOANS LEAD TO MORE TB DEATHS

The International Monetary Fund lends money to countries with financial problems and in return requires them to cut spending (amongst other things) to control inflation.

David Stuckler and colleagues at the University of Cambridge, England, have analysed the spread of tuberculosis in 21 countries in central and eastern Europe that received IMF loans after 1989. The researchers found that the loans were linked with a 13 per cent increase in cases of TB and 16 per cent more deaths.

The team also discovered that countries spent less on TB control and had fewer doctors per person after receiving IMF loans. What's more, the bigger the loan, the bigger the increase in TB that followed.

The effect was not because countries with worsening TB simply attracted more IMF attention, says Stuckler, as the TB rates were falling or at least steady before receipt of the IMF loans.

The team also found that for each year of a country's involvement with the IMF, the TB death rate increased by four per cent on average.

OLDEST SKELETON IN AMERICAS FOUND IN CAVE

Deep inside an underwater cave in Mexico, archaeologists may have discovered the oldest human skeleton ever found in the Americas. Dubbed Eva de Naharon, or Eve of Naharon, the female skeleton has been dated at 13,600 years old.

The remains have been excavated over the past four years near the town of Tulum, about 80 miles (128 km) southwest of Cancún, by a team of scientists led by Arturo González, director of the Desert Museum in Saltillo, Mexico.

"We don't know how [the people whose remains were found in the caves] arrived and whether they came from the Atlantic, the jungle or inside the continent," González said.

The three other skeletons excavated in the caves have been given a date range of 11,000 to 14,000 years ago, based on radiocarbon dating.

González has also found remains of elephants, giant sloths and other ancient fauna in the caves.

MIND CONTROL BY MOBILE PHONES?

Can the electrical signals coming from a phone affect certain brainwaves operating in resonance with cellphone/mobile phone transmission frequencies? Two studies provide some revealing news.

The first, led by Rodney Croft of the Brain Science Institute at Swinburne University of Technology in Melbourne, Australia, tested whether cellphone/mobile phone transmissions could alter a person's brainwaves. The data showed that when the cellphone was transmitting, the power alpha waves in the person's brain were boosted significantly.

If cellphone signals boost a person's alpha waves, does this nudge them subliminally into an altered state of consciousness or have any effect at all on the workings of their mind that can be observed in a person's behaviour?

In the second study, James Horne and colleagues at Loughborough University's Sleep Research Centre in England found that not only could the cellphone signals alter a person's behaviour during the call, but the effects of the disrupted brainwave patterns continued long after the phone was switched off.

"This was a completely unexpected finding," Horne said.

This research shows that cellphone transmissions can affect a person's brainwaves, with persistent effects on behaviour.

CHINA GROWS GIANT VEGETABLES FROM "SPACE SEEDS"

While most governments are reacting to the global food shortage by growing more food, China's government has decided to grow the same amount of fruits and vegetables but with a twist: giant versions of standard food staples—210 lb (95.3 kg) pumpkins, 2 lb (0.9 kg) tomatoes, and cucumbers over two feet (61 cm) long—which are currently feeding families in 22 of China's provinces. Governments in Europe, Japan and elsewhere are taking notice.

This weird, believe-it-or-not scenario becomes even more fantastic as it turns out that the reason these foods can grow so huge is because they've been sent into outer space. The seeds get blasted into outer space, and, after they return, they transform into enormous eatables—but no one knows why.

The Chinese Academy of Sciences started looking at the benefits of growing seeds in space in 1987, working with the then Soviet Union. Two years ago, the Shijian-8, the first recoverable satellite designed solely to carry "space seeds", was blasted into outer space on a Chinese Long March rocket. On board were more than 2,000 seeds.

Scientists have yet to offer a definitive explanation as to why space causes the seeds to mutate, but they believe that cosmic radiation, microgravity and magnetic fields may play a part. Beyond that guesswork, there seems to be no reason why seeds sent into space should grow into "miracle" foods back on Earth. Once the seeds are returned from space they are cultivated, and only fruit or vegetables that show improvements in size, taste or vitamin and mineral content are selected. The seeds from these plants are then bred over at least another three generations to ensure they remain stable.

The Guangdong Academy of Agricultural Science, 50 miles (80.5 km) from Guangzhou, could be the taste of things to come as China struggles to feed its population of 1.3 billion. Vast farms are already being used to cultivate these crops, as "space fruit and vegetables" are put on dinner tables across China. The program is being coordinated by the Chinese Academy of Sciences.

Futuristic greenhouses in southern China give birth to pumpkins 10 times their normal size, 160 lb (72.6 kg) Chinese winter melons, 14 lb (6.35 kg) aubergines, and chilli plants the size of small trees with fiery, nine-inch-long (22.8-cm-long) fruit that look more like exotic peppers.

Chinese scientists claim that some "space fruit and veggies" are better than the originals. The vitamin C content in some vegetables is nearly three times higher and there is a marked increase in trace elements such as zinc. Yields of "space rice" are 25 per cent higher. Research also shows that certain "space breeds" use proportionately less water than their more traditional counterparts, so they could be perfect for growing in arid areas.

To date, China has bred more than 50 new species of "space plants" and has plans to produce more than 200 new species.

"A lot more space-seed products are going to be coming on the market in the next two to three years, with sweet pepper, tomato and cucumber breeds on sale," said Chinese expert Lo Zhigang. "Some of China's space-seed products are already exported to Singapore, Thailand, Malaysia and Japan. These include breeds of cucumber, sweet pepper, tomatoes and broccoli."

And that's exactly what worries environmentalists. In the same way that genetically modified foods may present an as-yet-unknown danger to our health, the same may be true of "food from space".

IMPLANTED RFID CHIPS IN A SURVEILLANCE SOCIETY

Governments and their agencies in the USA and China are touting the benefits of radio-frequency identity chips for their ability to track, monitor and profile citizens and keep them under control.

New Threats to Privacy and Civil Liberties

If incorporating personal details into an RFID (radio-frequency identification) chip implanted into a passport or driver's licence may sound like a "smart" alternative to endless lines at the airport and intrusive questioning by seurocrats, think again.

Since the late 1990s, corporate grifters have touted the "benefits" of the devilish transmitters as a "convenient" and "cheap" way to tag individual commodities, one that would "revolutionise" inventory management and theft prevention. Indeed, everything from paper towels to shoes, pets to underwear has been "tagged" with the chips. "Savings" would be "passed on" to the consumer. Call it the "Wal-Martisation" of everyday life.

RFID tags are small computer chips connected to miniature antennae that can be fixed to or implanted within physical objects, including human beings. The RFID chip itself contains an Electronic Product Code that can be "read" when an RFID reader emits a radio signal. The chips are divided into two categories: passive and active. A "passive" tag doesn't contain a battery and its "read" range is variable, from less than an inch (2.5 cm) to 20 or 30 feet (6.1 or 9.14 metres). An "active" tag, on the other hand, is self-powered and has a much longer range. The data from an "active" tag can be sent directly to a computer system involved in inventory control—or surveillance.

But as Consumers Against Supermarket Privacy Invasion and Numbering (CASPIAN) together with the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), the Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) and the Electronic Privacy Information Center (EPIC) stated in a 2003 joint position paper, "RFID has the potential to jeopardize consumer privacy, reduce or eliminate purchasing anonymity, and threaten civil liberties". ("Position Statement on the Use of RFID on Consumer Products", Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, 14 November 2003, http://w2.eff.org/Privacy/Surveillance/RFID/rfid_position_statement.php)

As these organisations noted:

"While there are beneficial uses of RFID, some attributes of the technology could be deployed in ways that threaten privacy and civil liberties:

- Hidden placement of tags. RFID tags can be embedded into/onto objects and documents without the knowledge of the individual who obtains those items. As radio waves travel easily and silently through fabric, plastic, and other materials, it is possible to read RFID tags sewn into clothing or affixed to objects contained in purses, shopping bags, suitcases, and more.

- Unique identifiers for all objects worldwide. The Electronic Product Code potentially enables every object on earth to have its own unique ID. The use of unique ID numbers could lead to the creation of a global item registration system in which every physical object is identified and linked to its purchaser or owner at the point of sale or transfer.

- Massive data aggregation. RFID deployment requires the creation of massive databases containing unique tag data. These records could be linked with personal identifying data, especially as computer memory and processing capacities expand.

- Hidden readers. Tags can be read from a distance, not restricted to line of sight, by readers that can be incorporated invisibly into nearly any environment where human beings or items congregate. RFID readers have already been experimentally embedded into floor tiles, woven into carpeting and floor mats, hidden in doorways, and seamlessly incorporated into retail shelving and counters, making it virtually impossible for a consumer to know when or if he or she was being 'scanned'.

- Individual tracking and profiling. If personal identity were linked with unique RFID tag numbers, individuals could be profiled and tracked without their knowledge or consent. For example, a tag embedded in a shoe could serve as a de facto identifier for the person wearing it. Even if item-level information remains generic, identifying items people wear or carry could associate them with, for example, particular events like political rallies." (ibid.)

The Security State

As the corporatist police state unfurls its murderous tentacles here in the USA, it should come as no surprise that securocrats breathlessly tout the "benefits" of RFID in the area of "homeland security". It doesn't take a genius to conclude that when linked to massive commercial databases as well as those compiled by the 16 separate agencies of the "intelligence community"—such as the Terrorist Identities Datamart Environment (TIDE) that feeds the federal government's surveillance leviathan with the names of suspected "terrorists"—the architecture for a vast totalitarian enterprise is off the drawing board and onto the streets.

As last week's mass repression of peaceful protest at the Republican National Convention in St Paul, Minnesota, amply demonstrated, the Bush regime's "pre-emptive war" strategy has been rolled out. (Tom Eley, "RNC in Twin Cities: Eight protesters charged with terrorism under Patriot Act", WSWS, 6 September 2008, <http://www.wsws.org/articles/2008/sep2008/poli-s06.shtml>)

RFIDs, AIMS and Biometrics

RFIDs are likened to barcodes that scan items at the grocery store checkout line, but what industry flacks such as the Association for Automatic Identification and Mobility (AAIM) fail to mention in their propaganda about RFIDs is that the information stored on a passport or driver's licence can be readily stolen by anyone with a reader device—marketers, security agents, criminals or stalkers—without the cardholder even being remotely aware that they are being tracked and their allegedly

"secure" information plundered. According to a blurb on the AAIM website:

"Automatic Identification and Mobility (AIM) technologies are a diverse family of technologies that share the common purpose of identifying, tracking, recording, storing and communicating essential business, personal, or product data. In most cases, AIM technologies serve as the front end of enterprise software systems, providing fast and accurate collection and entry of data." (AAIM, undated, <http://www.aimglobal.org/technologies/>)

Among the "diverse family of technologies" touted by AAIM, many are rife with "dual-use" potential; that is, the same technology that can keep track of a pallet of soft drinks can also keep track of human beings. Indeed, the Association touts biometrics as "automated methods of recognizing a person based on a physiological or behavioral characteristic". This is especially important, since the "need for biometrics can be found in federal, state and local governments, in the military, and in commercial applications". When used as a stand-alone or in conjunction with RFID-chipped "smart cards", biometric technologies "are set to pervade nearly all aspects of the economy and our daily lives". (AAIM, undated, <http://www.aimglobal.org/technologies/biometrics>)

Some "revolution".

In 2006, IBM obtained a patent that will be used for tracking and profiling consumers as they move around a store, even if access to commercial databases is strictly limited.

IBM's "Person Tracking Unit"

The industry received a powerful incentive from the state when the Government Services Administration, a Bushist satrapy, issued a memo in December 2004 that urged the heads of all federal agencies "to consider action that can be taken to advance the [RFID] industry". (<http://www.spychips.com/press-releases/gsa-document.html>) An example of capitalist "ingenuity" or another insidious invasion of our right to privacy?

In 2006, IBM obtained a patent that will be used for tracking and profiling consumers as they move around a store, even if access to commercial databases is strictly limited. And when it comes to tracking and profiling human beings—say, for mass extermination at the behest of crazed Nazi ideologues—IBM stands alone. In his groundbreaking 2001 exploration of the enabling technologies for the mass murder of Jews, communists, Romany, gays and lesbians, investigative journalist Edwin Black described in IBM and the Holocaust how, beginning in 1933, IBM and its subsidiaries created technological "solutions" that streamlined the identification of "undesirables" for quick and efficient asset confiscation, deportation, slave labour and eventual annihilation. (IBM and the Holocaust: The Strategic Alliance between Nazi Germany and America's Most Powerful Corporation, Crown, New York, 2001, pp. 7-8, excerpts at <http://www.ibmandtheholocaust.com/excerpts.php>)

It's an eerie echo of polices being enacted today against Muslims and left-wing "extremists" by the corrupt Bush regime in its quixotic quest to "keep America safe" in furtherance of capitalist and imperialist goals of global domination.

As security and privacy analyst Katherine Albrecht writes, describing IBM's patented "Identification and Tracking of Persons Using RFID-Tagged Items in Store Environments":

"It chillingly details RFID's potential for surveillance in a world where networked RFID readers called 'person tracking units' would be incorporated virtually everywhere people go—in 'shopping malls, airports, train stations, bus stations, elevators, trains, airplanes, restrooms, sports arenas, libraries, theaters, [and] museums'—to closely monitor people's movements." ("How RFID Tags Could Be Used to Track Unsuspecting People", Scientific American, August 2008, <http://www.sciam.com/article.cfm?id=how-rfid-tags-could-be-used>)

According to the patent cited by Albrecht, as an individual moves around a store or a city centre: "[An] RFID tag scanner located [in the desired tracking location] ... scans the RFID tags on [a] person... As that person moves around the store, different RFID tag scanners located throughout the store can pick up radio signals from the RFID tags carried on that person and the movement of that person is tracked based on these detections... The person tracking unit may keep records of different locations where the person has visited, as well as the visitation times." (ibid.)

Even if no personal data are stored in the RFID tag, this doesn't present a problem, IBM explains, because "the personal information will be obtained when the person uses his or her credit card, bank card, shopper card or the like". As Albrecht avers, the link between the unique RFID number and a person's identity "needs to be made only once for the card to serve as a proxy for the person thereafter". (ibid.) With the wholesale introduction of RFID-chipped passports and driver's licences, the capitalist panoptic state is quickly—and quietly—falling into place.

Population Surveillance in China and the USA

If America's main trading partner and sometime geopolitical rival in the looting of world resources, China, is any indication of the direction in which near-future surveillance technologies are being driven by the "miracle of the market", the curtain on privacy and individual rights is rapidly drawing to a close. Albrecht writes:

...governments, particularly the crazed, corporate-controlled grifters holding down the fort in Washington, most certainly will take advantage of RFID's surveillance potential.

"China's national ID cards, for instance, are encoded with what most people would consider a shocking amount of personal information, including health and reproductive history, employment status, religion, ethnicity and even the name and phone number of each cardholder's landlord. More ominous still, the cards are part of a larger project to blanket Chinese cities with state-of-the-art surveillance technologies.

Michael Lin, a vice president for China Public Security Technology, a private company providing the RFID cards for the program, unflinchingly described them to the New York Times as 'a way for the government to control the population in the future'. And even if other governments do not take advantage of the surveillance potential inherent in the new ID cards, ample evidence suggests that data-hungry corporations will." (ibid.)

I would disagree with Albrecht on one salient point: governments, particularly the crazed, corporate-controlled grifters holding down the fort in Washington, most certainly will take advantage of RFID's surveillance potential.

In March 2005, for example, the Senate Republican High Tech Task Force praised RFID applications as "exciting new technologies" with "tremendous promise for our economy". In this spirit, they vowed to "protect" RFID from regulation and legislation. (<http://republican.senate.gov/http/>) Needless to say, the track record of timid Democrats is hardly any better when it comes to defending privacy rights or something as "quaint" as the Constitution.

Under conditions of a looming economic meltdown, rising unemployment, staggering debt, the collapse of financial markets and continuing wars and occupations in Iraq and Afghanistan, US imperialism, in order to shore up its crumbling empire, will continue to import totalitarian methods of rule employed in its "global war on terror" onto the home front. The introduction of RFID-chipped passports and driver's licences for the mass surveillance and political repression of the American people arises within this context. ∞

POPULATION CONTROL UNDER THE GUISE OF CONSUMER PROTECTION

The Codeath, sorry, Codex Alimentarius Commission is a very misunderstood organisation. Most people have never heard of it, and those who have heard of it may not understand the true reality of this extremely powerful trade organisation. According to the official Codex website (<http://www.codexalimentarius.net>), the altruistic purpose of this commission is in "protecting health of the consumers and ensuring fair trade practices in the food trade, and promoting coordination of all food standards work undertaken by international governmental and non-governmental organizations". The Codex Alimentarius (Latin for "Food Code") is regulated under a joint venture between the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) and the World Health Organization (WHO).

Brief History of Codex

The history of Codex began in 1893 when the Austro-Hungarian Empire decided it needed a specific set of guidelines by which the courts could rule on cases dealing with food.¹ This set of regulatory mandates became known as Codex Alimentarius. It was effectively implemented until the fall of the empire in 1918.

At a meeting in 1962, the United Nations (UN) decided that Codex should be re-implemented worldwide in order to "protect" the health of consumers. Two-thirds of funding for Codex emanates from the FAO, and the other third comes from the WHO.

In 2002, FAO and WHO had serious concerns about the direction of Codex and hired an external consultant to determine its performance since 1962 and to designate which direction to take the trade organisation.² The consultant concluded that Codex should be scrapped immediately. It was at this time that big industry stepped in and exerted its powerful influence. The updated outcome was a toned-down report asking Codex to address 20 concerns within the organisation.

Since 2002, the Codex Alimentarius Commission has covertly surrendered its role as an international public health and consumer protection organisation. Under the helm of big industry, the surreptitious purpose of the new Codex is to increase profits for the global corporate juggernauts while controlling the world through food.

Codex Inequalities

The most dominant country behind the agenda of Codex is the United States, whose primary purpose is to benefit the large multinational interests of Big Pharma, Big Agribusiness, Big Chema and the like. At the latest meeting in Geneva, Switzerland (30 June to 4 July 2008), the US became the chair of Codex³ and now will exacerbate the distortion of health freedom and continue to promulgate misinformation and lies about nutrients and genetically modified organisms (GMOs) while fulfilling its tacit population-control agenda. One reason why the US continues to dominate Codex is because other countries falsely believe that it possesses the latest and greatest food safety technology; hence, whatever the US asks for, its allies (Australia, Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Indonesia, Japan, Malaysia, Mexico, Singapore and the European Union) follow suit nearly every time.

The fact that Codex meetings are held all over the world is also no accident and allows the US to maintain its tight grip on the Codex agenda because the less economically viable countries are not able to attend. The governments of many of these countries (such as Cameroon, Egypt, Ghana, Kenya, Nigeria, South Africa, Sudan and Swaziland) realise that Codex has been altered from a benevolent food organisation to one that is fraudulent, lethal and illegitimate.

Health Freedom Threats

While the mainstream media are busy with their esoteric agenda of driving fear into the hearts of the world's populace by focusing on terrorism, global warming, salmonella outbreaks and food shortages, the real threats are surreptitiously becoming a reality. Soon, every single thing you put into your mouth, including water (with the exception of pharmaceuticals, of course), will be highly regulated by the Codex Alimentarius Commission.

The Codex standards are a complete affront to people's freedom to access clean, healthy food and beneficial nutrients, yet these regulations have no legal international standing. Why should we be worried? These soon-to-be mandatory standards will apply to every country that's a member of the World Trade Organization (WTO) (presently there are 153 members). If countries do not follow these standards, then crippling economic and trade sanctions may be imposed on them, although countries may be able to avoid the standards of Codex through the implementation of their own international standards.

Some government-run agencies, like the Therapeutic Goods Administration (TGA) in Australia, are informing the public that the vitamin and mineral guideline of Codex will not affect their country. For example, the TGA had this to say: "The proposed Codex Guidelines for Vitamin and Mineral Food Supplements will not apply in Australia and will have no impact on the way these types of products are regulated in Australia."⁴

The bottom line is that no one knows what types of laws will be passed before Codex harmonisation occurs, and no country is safe from these international guidelines, regardless of what government agencies are saying in order to quell pre-emptively any potential public uprising. Many alternative health activists believe this may be a method to confuse and obfuscate the Codex issue until it is too late.

Some Codex standards which are proposed to take effect in the near future, and which will be completely irrevocable once initiated, include:⁵

- All nutrients (e.g., vitamins and minerals) are to be considered toxins/poisons and are to be removed from all food because Codex prohibits the use of nutrients to "prevent, treat or cure any condition or disease".

- All food (including organic) is to be irradiated, thus removing all "toxic" nutrients from food (unless consumers can source their food locally). The precursor to Codex harmonisation in this area began in the USA in August 2008 with the clandestine decision to mandate the mass irradiation of all lettuce and spinach in the name of public health and safety. If the safety of the public was the main concern of the US Food and Drug Administration (FDA), then why were people not alerted to this new practice?

- Nutrients allowed will be limited to a Positive List developed by Codex; it will include such "beneficial" nutrients as fluoride (3.8 mg daily), sourced from industrial waste.

...no country is safe from these mandatory international guidelines, regardless of what government agencies are saying in order to quell pre-emptively any potential public uprising.

"I did my university degree online, met my girlfriend on FaceBook, got married live-streaming on YouTube and make a living buying/selling on eBay. I'm just worried I won't find a cemetery website I can be buried in."

- All nutrients (e.g., vitamins A, B, C, D, zinc and magnesium) that have any positive health impact on the body will be deemed illegal in therapeutic doses under Codex and are to be reduced to amounts negligible to health, with maximum limits set at 15 per cent of the current Recommended Dietary Allowance (RDA).⁶ You will not be able to obtain these nutrients in therapeutic doses anywhere in the world, even with a prescription.

Potentially permissible safe levels of nutrients under the Codex are not yet set in stone. Some probable examples based on the European Union (EU) system may include:

- Niacin: upper limit of 34 μg (micrograms) daily (effective daily doses range from 2,000 to 3,000 μg).

- Vitamin C: upper limits of 65 to 225 μg daily (effective daily doses range from 6,000 to 10,000 μg).

- Vitamin D: upper limit of 5 μg daily (effective daily doses range from 6,000 to 10,000 μg).

- Vitamin E: upper limit of 15 IU (international units) of alpha tocopherol per day, even though alpha tocopherol by itself has been implicated in cell damage and is toxic to the body (effective daily doses of mixed tocopherols range from 10,000 to 12,000 IU).

- It will most likely be illegal to give any advice on nutrition (including in written articles posted online and in journals as well as oral advice to a friend, a family member or anyone). This directive applies to any and all reports on vitamins and minerals and all nutritionists' consultations. This type of information may be considered a hidden barrier to trade and may result in economic trade sanctions for the involved country.

- All dairy cows on the planet are to be treated with Monsanto's genetically engineered recombinant bovine growth hormone (rBGH).

- All animals used for food are to be treated with potent antibiotics and exogenous growth hormones.

- Deadly and carcinogenic organic pesticides, including seven of the 12 worst (e.g., hexachlorobenzene, toxaphene and aldrin), which were banned by 176 countries (including the US) in 1991 at the Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants,⁷ will be allowed back into food at elevated levels.

- The Codex will allow dangerous and toxic levels of aflatoxin (0.5 ppb) in milk. Aflatoxin, produced in animal feed that's gone mouldy in storage, is the second-most-potent (non-radiation-related) carcinogenic compound known.

- Use of growth hormones and antibiotics will be mandatory on all livestock, birds and aquacultured species meant for human consumption.

- The worldwide introduction of unlabelled and deadly GMOs into crops, animals, fish and plants will be mandated.

- Elevated levels of residue from pesticides and insecticides that are toxic to humans and animals will be allowed.

The Population Control Agenda

In 1995, the FDA adopted an illegal policy which stated that international standards (i.e., Codex) would supersede

US laws governing all food, even if these standards were incomplete.⁸ Furthermore, in 2004, the US passed the Central America Free Trade Agreement (illegal under US law, but legal under international law) that requires the US to conform to Codex.⁹

Once these standards are adopted, there is no way to return to the standards of old, but countries can adopt ones that are considered higher than those of Codex. An example of this would be the European Supplements Directive. Once Codex compliance begins in any area, as long as any country remains a member of the WTO, it is totally irrevocable: the standards cannot be repealed, changed or altered in any way, shape or form.^{10, 11, 12}

Population control for money is the easiest way to describe the new Codex Alimentarius, which in effect is being run by the US and primarily controlled by Big Pharma with the aim of reducing the world's population from its current estimate of 6.692 billion to a sustainable 500 million—an approximate 93 per cent reduction. Interestingly enough, before the arrival of Europeans in America, the Native American population in the US was around 60 million;¹³ today it hovers around 500,000, or an approximate 92 per cent reduction as a result of government policies of genocide, starvation and poisoning.

Codex is similar to other population control measures undertaken clandestinely by governments of the western world; for example, the introduction of DNA-damaging and latent immunosuppressive agents in vaccines (e.g., weaponised avian flu and AIDS), aspartame, chemtrails, chemotherapy for cancer treatment and RU486 (the abortion pill funded by the Rockefeller dynasty).

FAO and WHO have estimated that by the introduction of just the vitamin and mineral guideline alone, within 10 years a minimum three billion deaths will result.¹⁴ One billion of these deaths will be due to starvation, and two billion as a result of preventable and degenerative diseases of undernutrition, e.g., cancer, cardiovascular disease and diabetes.^{15,16}

Population control for money is the easiest way to describe the new Codex Alimentarius, which in effect is being run by the US and primarily controlled by Big Pharma...

The foisting of degraded, demineralised, pesticide-filled and irradiated foods on consumers is the fastest and most efficient way to cause a profitable surge in malnutrition and preventable and degenerative diseases, for which the most appropriate course of action is toxic pharmaceutical treatment. Death for profit is the new name of the game.

Big Pharma has been waiting for Codex harmonisation for years. An incognisant world population physically degenerating at an accelerated pace, providing a spike in revenue, is the ultimate goal for the furtive and egregious controllers of this corrupt trade organisation purportedly looking out for the health of consumers.

Fighting Back with Private Standards

Rima Laibow, MD, medical director for the Natural Solutions Foundation, has brought legal action against the US government and continues to attend every Codex meeting as a public observer while fighting for our health freedom. She has also been meeting with delegates from various countries to make them aware of Private Standards, which allow countries to draft food standards which are safer and higher than those mandated by Codex. Obviously, drafting safer standards is not a difficult task, and many countries can seemingly circumvent the flawed and irrevocable guidelines that Codex is attempting to implement.¹⁷

Battle over GM Labelling

The latest Codex meeting in Geneva concluded with some interesting outcomes. Some long-simmering acrimony began to surface as the US continued to force forward the biased agendas of Big Pharma, Big Chema, Big Agribusiness and the like without considering the input of many other countries. Typically, if the US does not want a country's input, the host country of the meeting simply denies visas to official delegates. Several countries object to this practice and stated that because of this and other reasons, decisions made by Codex in their absence do not have international legitimacy.

One major point of contention is the US and the Codex Alimentarius Commission's staunch refusal to allow labelling of GMOs. Japan, Norway, Russia, Switzerland and virtually all the African countries and 26 European Union countries have fought the US for nearly 18 years to introduce mandatory labelling of GMOs. The US fallaciously considers GMOs to be equivalent to non-GMOs, based solely on a 1992 Executive Order from then-President George H. W. Bush. Consequently, no pre-market safety testing is conducted on any GMOs before they are released into the food chain in the US. The FDA refuses to review any safety data except to conduct a single preliminary review early in the organism's development.

Opponents of the US policy prohibiting labelling of genetically modified food conclude that the US does not want GMOs labelled because of the potential legal ramifications for and liability of manufacturers and the US government if these foods can be traced. If millions of people are harmed or killed due to the instability of the inserted DNA promoter viruses and marker bacteria when interacting with the dynamic and fluid structure of the human body, then millions of lawsuits may result. But if these GMOs are totally untraceable, then corporate or government liability cannot be assessed and the health of the entire population suffers. Some FDA scientists have repeatedly warned about releasing GMOs into the general food supply because of the dangers, but they have been ignored or routinely overruled.

Prior to the Geneva meeting, the Codex Committee on Food Labelling met in Ottawa, Canada (28 April to 2 May 2008). The meeting concluded with several pro-mandatory GMO labelling nations angry that the committee had not objectively analysed the empirical research, prepared by the South Africa delegation, detailing the dangers of GMOs. This document delineated the need for mandatory labelling of GMOs, but was ignored and subsequently withdrawn due to US pressure. As a result, several countries planned to scrap the requirements of Codex and adopt their own labelling system for GMOs in an effort to curtail the spread of "lethal" food. This became a real quandary for FAO and WHO.

According to Dr Laibow, at the recent Geneva meeting FAO and WHO finally stepped in and decided to undertake a program to identify low-level contamination of GMOs in food.

The definition of low-level contamination will still depend on each country's standards. For example, the US

MAGNESIUM CHLORIDE FOR HEALTH AND REJUVENATION

A mineral nutrient compound sourced from evaporated sea water, magnesium chloride is treasured for its ability to promote health and vitality, treat numerous diseases, combat the ageing process and fight infections.

Magnesium is nothing short of a miracle mineral in its healing effect on a wide range of diseases as well as in its ability to rejuvenate the aging body. We know that it is essential for many enzyme reactions, especially in regard to cellular energy production, for the health of the brain and nervous system and also for healthy teeth and bones. However, it may come as a surprise that in the form of magnesium chloride it is also an impressive infection fighter.¹

The above statement by retired biochemist and nutritionist Walter Last is no exaggeration in summarising the overriding importance of magnesium for our health. It is doubly true because the magnesium intake with our food has greatly declined due to the use of inorganic fertilisers with an oversupply of calcium, and also because the medical profession overemphasises our need for a high calcium intake and excessive calcium supplementation at the expense of magnesium.

While calcium and magnesium work together in the body, they are also opposites in their effects on our metabolism. This is largely due to the activity of the parathyroid glands which try to keep the combined product of calcium and magnesium in our blood steady and balanced against phosphorus. If the magnesium levels are low, then the calcium levels need rise to restore balance. Where does this extra calcium come from? From the bones and teeth, of course!

This is even more of a problem when the parathyroids are chronically overstimulated, usually combined with an underactive thyroid. This is a common situation with the presence of candidiasis, mercury dental fillings and root canal fillings: all of these appear to depress thyroid functions and overstimulate the parathyroids.

What does the body do with the excess calcium in the blood? It dumps it into tissue wherever there is some chronic inflammation. This leads, for instance, to the calcification of joints, as in arthritis, and to the calcification of ovaries and other glands, resulting in declining hormone production. Calcifying kidneys eventually require dialysis, and calcifications in breast tissue, especially the milk ducts, are often managed with unnecessary mastectomies and other invasive treatments.

Magnesium for Healthy Bones and Teeth

Medical authorities claim that the widespread incidence of osteoporosis and tooth decay in western countries can be prevented with a high calcium intake. However, published evidence reveals that the opposite is true.² Asian and African populations with a very low intake of about 300 milligrams (mg) of calcium daily have very little incidence of osteoporosis. In Africa, Bantu women with an intake of 200 to 350 mg of calcium daily have the lowest incidence of osteoporosis in the world. In western countries with a high intake of dairy products, the average calcium intake is about 1,000 mg. The higher the calcium intake, especially in the form of cow's milk products (except butter), the higher the incidence of osteoporosis.³

Calcium, magnesium and phosphorus levels are kept in a seesaw balance by the parathyroid hormones. If calcium goes up, magnesium goes down and vice versa. With a low magnesium intake, calcium goes out of the bones to increase the calcium levels in tissues, while a high magnesium intake causes calcium to go out of the tissues and into the bones. A high phosphorus intake without a high calcium or magnesium intake causes calcium to leach from the bones and then leave the body with the urine. A high phosphorus intake with high calcium and magnesium leads to bone mineralisation.

Dr Lewis B. Barnett, an orthopaedic surgeon, practised in two different US counties with very different mineral levels in soil and water. In Dallas County, Texas, with a high calcium and low magnesium concentration in the water supply, osteoporosis and hip fractures were very common, while in Hereford, Texas, with high magnesium and low calcium levels, these were nearly absent. In Dallas County, the magnesium content of bones was 0.5 per cent, while in Hereford it was 1.76 per cent. In another comparison, the magnesium content in bones of osteoporosis sufferers was 0.62 per cent, while in healthy individuals it was 1.26 per cent.⁴

The same applies for healthy teeth as for healthy bones. In a New Zealand study, it was found that caries-resistant teeth had on average twice the amount of magnesium as caries-prone teeth. The average concentration of magnesium phosphate in bones is given as about 1.0 per cent, in teeth about 1.5 per cent, in elephant tusks 2.0 per cent and in the teeth of carnivorous animals that crush bones it is 5.0 per cent. In regard to the strength of bones and teeth, think of calcium as chalk and magnesium as superglue. The magnesium superglue binds and transforms the chalk into superior bones and teeth.⁵

One patient reported to Walter Last: "My doctor rang Friday afternoon re my bone density scan and wanted to know what I have been doing over the last two years. I asked why, and she said that by looking at the 2005 and 2006 scans, she could see with the 2008 scan that I had improved. She couldn't believe it, and said that normally when you are in the osteoporosis range you don't come out of it."⁶ That doctor was actually saying that she knew the accepted treatment of high calcium supplementation does not work but is used anyway.

This patient had reversed the medical treatment by lowering calcium and greatly increasing her intake of magnesium (in addition to boron).

Magnesium Absorption and Dosage

A solution to this problem is to lower calcium levels in the blood by keeping up a high intake of magnesium. However, any excess magnesium is quickly lost with the urine. Therefore, to keep calcium in the bones and teeth rather than around the joints and in the soft tissues, we need a steady supply of magnesium.

Traditionally, magnesium in our diet has been mainly in ionic form and is converted in the stomach into magnesium chloride or it binds to protein, especially chlorophyll, and then is broken down, ending up for absorption as magnesium chloride or chelated magnesium. Therefore, when supplementing, we may as well use magnesium chloride directly instead of magnesium oxide or hydroxide and other forms that require additional hydrochloric acid.

Magnesium chloride has another advantage: it provides ions of magnesium and chloride which are both required to stimulate the activity of digestive enzymes and produce hydrochloric acid in the stomach.

Magnesium sulphate, also known as Epsom salts, is poorly absorbed and therefore attracts water in the colon and functions as a laxative.

If fruit and vegetables are grown in mineral-rich soil, then these foods contain a high content of minerals, including magnesium. As the plant grows, it converts the inorganic minerals into organic minerals and these then bind to acids like citric acid and are easily absorbed in this form. While most forms of magnesium have a good bioavailability, chelates with amino acids and magnesium bound to fruit acids also have a beneficial alkalisating effect on the body.

The efficiency of magnesium absorption varies inversely with the quantity of magnesium intake. Magnesium is absorbed into the body primarily from the ileum of the small intestine. When consuming the RDI (Recommended Dietary Intake) of magnesium, which is an average of between 360 and 410 mg a day, we absorb approximately 50 per cent of magnesium, but when ingesting sub-optimal quantities we may absorb as much as 75 per cent. Absorption decreases rapidly when more than 200 mg is consumed at one time, therefore it's important to take magnesium in divided doses throughout the day.

Magnesium chloride can be added to food or drink, like juice, mostly to disguise the salty-bitter taste. I mix it with juice myself, a quarter of a teaspoon at a time, and it is fine. However, it's a matter of personal preference. You can start with a few drops in your meal or drink and slowly build up to half a teaspoon twice a day—amounting to 600 mg of magnesium chloride daily.

When dealing with factors such as stress, advancing age, cardiovascular problems and signs of calcification, up to 1,000 mg is the daily dosage recommended by many health practitioners. The intestinal absorption of magnesium declines with ageing and the presence of gastrointestinal disorders, and especially with dysbiosis caused by antibiotics and other pharmaceutical drugs. Excessive loss of magnesium in urine can also be a side effect of some pharmaceuticals.⁷

A study published in 2005 showed that over two-thirds of Americans do not consume even the low level of the RDI of magnesium, and 19 per cent use less than one-half of this.⁸ It may take up to three months or longer of oral magnesium supplementation to replenish intracellular magnesium status, and according to Dr Norm Shealy it can take up to a year.⁹

"Magnesium Oil" in Transdermal Therapy

All these problems make it more attractive to use magnesium chloride transdermally (absorbed through the skin), bypassing the digestive system with the need for hydrochloric acid and a well-functioning digestive tract.

Magnesium chloride consists of 11.8 per cent magnesium bound to 88.2 per cent chloride. It is produced through evaporation from saline waters, mainly sea water (and also from the Dead Sea). After removal of sodium chloride, the bittern remains, containing mainly magnesium chloride and magnesium sulphate.¹⁰ Magnesium chloride is much less bitter than magnesium sulphate.

In the dry form, magnesium chloride is usually sold as white hygroscopic (water-attracting) flakes, hydrated with six molecules of water (hexahydrate) for each unit of magnesium along with two chloride ions (MgCl₂). This affinity with water means that magnesium chloride can be used as a product called "magnesium oil", which can be applied to the skin as a transdermal magnesium therapy. It is not oil in the true sense, but has the feel of oil when rubbed on the skin.

Over a cup of lemongrass tea with Walter Last, I first heard about magnesium chloride used as magnesium oil and described in much detail in the book Transdermal Magnesium Therapy by Mark Sircus. As a health supplement, it is safe to take internally or externally. Sircus writes:

*Magnesium chloride solution is not only harmless for tissue, but it had also a great effect over leucocytosis; so it was perfect for external wound treatment.*¹¹

Rejuvenation by ingesting more magnesium is a slow process, especially as the amount of magnesium that we can take is limited by its laxative effect and the need to keep it in a reasonable balance with the calcium and phosphorus intake. The other problem is that spastic muscles have poor blood and lymph circulation, which makes it difficult for ingested magnesium to dissolve and flush out the tissue and joint calcifications. These problems then call for the use of magnesium oil.

We can greatly speed up the rejuvenation process by increasing the circulation through permanently contracted muscles by using magnesium oil with deep tissue massage or just frequent rubbing, or by using it in hot packs. However, we need to be careful with sensitive skin, as the magnesium oil may sting for a while. In this case, it's best to dilute it to an acceptable level. If rubbed on in a rather diluted form, it may gradually disappear into the skin, but in concentrated form it just remains sticky and needs to be washed or showered off after some time. However, with many conditions, such as arthritis and other forms of stiffness and pain, it's a good idea to apply it to the affected area and cover it with some old cloths overnight.

Antimicrobial Action of Magnesium

Magnesium chloride is a great infection fighter as well, which no other magnesium combination can claim to be.

The first prominent researcher to investigate and promote the antibiotic effects of magnesium was a French surgeon, Professor Pierre Delbet, MD.¹² In 1915, he was looking for a solution to cleanse soldiers' wounds because he found that traditionally used antiseptics actually damaged tissues and encouraged infections instead of preventing them. In all his tests, magnesium chloride solution was by far the best. He found that not only was it harmless for tissues, but it also greatly increased leucocyte activity and phagocytosis, the destruction of pathogenic microbes.

Later, Professor Delbet performed experiments with the internal application of magnesium chloride and found it to be a powerful immune system stimulant. In his experiments, phagocytosis increased by up to 333 per cent. This means that after magnesium chloride intake, the same number of white blood cells destroyed up to three times more microbes than before.

Gradually, Professor Delbet found magnesium chloride

He found that not only was it harmless for tissues, but it also greatly increased leucocyte activity and phagocytosis, the destruction of pathogenic microbes.

to be beneficial in treating a wide range of diseases. These included: diseases of the digestive tract such as colitis and gall bladder problems; Parkinson's disease, tremors and muscle cramps; acne, eczema, psoriasis, warts and itching skin; impotence, prostatic hypertrophy, cerebral and circulatory problems; and asthma, hay fever, urticaria and anaphylactic reactions. Hair and nails became stronger and healthier, and patients had more energy.

Professor Delbet also found that magnesium chloride had a very good preventive effect against cancer and cured precancerous conditions such as leukoplasia, hyperkeratosis and chronic mastitis. Epidemiological studies confirmed that regions with magnesium-rich soil had less cancer than those with low magnesium levels.

Professor Delbet used to give magnesium chloride solution routinely to his patients with infections and for several days before any planned surgery, and he was surprised that many of these patients experienced euphoria and bursts of energy. Magnesium chloride supposedly has a specific action on the tetanus virus and its effects on the body. It even seems to be protective against snake bites. Guinea pigs did not die after normally lethal injections of snake venom and a rabbit survived a poisonous snakebite when given magnesium chloride solution.

Another French doctor, Dr A. Neveu,¹³ cured several diphtheria patients with magnesium chloride within two days. He also published 15 cases of poliomyelitis that was cured within days if treatment was started immediately or within months if paralysis had already progressed. Dr Neveu found magnesium chloride effective against asthma, bronchitis, pneumonia, emphysema, pharyngitis, tonsillitis, hoarseness, common cold, influenza, whooping cough, measles, rubella, mumps, scarlet fever, poisoning, gastroenteritis, boils, abscesses, whitlow, infected wounds and osteomyelitis.

In more recent years, Raul Vergini, MD and others confirmed these earlier results and added more illnesses and conditions to the list of successful uses of magnesium chloride: acute asthma attack, shock, tetanus, herpes zoster, acute and chronic conjunctivitis, optic neuritis, rheumatic diseases, many allergic diseases and chronic fatigue syndrome. They also found it to have beneficial effects in cancer therapy. In all of these cases, magnesium chloride gave much better results than other magnesium compounds.¹⁴

Magnesium for Nerves

Magnesium has a calming effect on the nervous system, so it is frequently used to promote good sleep. It can also be used to calm irritated and overexcited nerves. This is especially useful with epileptic seizures, convulsions in pregnant women and the "shakes" in alcoholics. Magnesium levels are generally low in alcoholics, contributing to or causing many of their health problems. If magnesium levels are low, the nerves lose control over muscle activity, respiration and mental processes. Nervous fatigue, tics and twitches, tremors, irritability, hypersensitivity, muscle spasms, restlessness, anxiety, confusion, disorientation and irregular heartbeat all respond to increased magnesium intake. A common phenomenon of magnesium deficiency is a sharp muscle reaction to an unexpected, loud noise. "Memory pills" have been marketed that consist mainly of magnesium.¹⁵

Sleep in magnesium deficiency is restless and agitated and is disturbed by frequent night-time awakenings. However, all forms of magnesium are not equally effective. In a study of more than 200 patients, Dr W.

Davis used magnesium chloride as a possible means of combatting insomnia. The researcher reported that sleep was induced rapidly and was uninterrupted, and that waking tiredness disappeared in 99 per cent of the patients. In addition, anxiety and tension diminished during the day.¹⁶

Many of the symptoms of Parkinson's disease can be overcome with high magnesium supplementation; shaking can be prevented and rigidity eased. With pre-eclampsia, pregnant women may develop convulsions, nausea, dizziness and headaches; in hospitals, this is treated with magnesium infusions. Because of its strongly relaxing effect, magnesium helps not only in promoting better sleep but is also useful in overcoming headaches and migraines. Even the number of suicides is linked with magnesium deficiency: the lower the magnesium content in soil and water in a given region, the higher the suicide rate.¹⁷

Epilepsy is marked by abnormally low magnesium levels in the blood, spinal fluid and brain, causing hyperexcitability in regions of the brain. There are many reported cases of epilepsy greatly improving or disappearing with magnesium supplementation. In a trial with 30 epileptics, 450 mg of magnesium supplied daily successfully controlled their seizures. Another study found that the lower the magnesium blood level, the more severe was the epilepsy.

Magnesium works best combined with vitamin B6 and zinc. In sufficient concentrations, magnesium inhibits convulsions by limiting or slowing the spread of the electric discharge from an isolated group of brain cells to the rest of the brain. Even the initial burst of firing nerve cells that starts an epileptic attack can be suppressed with magnesium.¹⁸

They also found it to have beneficial effects in cancer therapy. In all of these cases, magnesium chloride gave much better results than other magnesium compounds.

Magnesium for Rejuvenation

Calcium and magnesium are opposites in their effects on our body structure. As a general rule, the softer our body structure, the more we need calcium; the more rigid and inflexible it is, the less calcium and the more magnesium we need. Magnesium can reverse the age-related degenerative calcification of our body structure and, with this, help us to rejuvenate. Walter Last calls magnesium "the mineral for rejuvenation".

Young women, children and, most of all, babies have soft body structures and smooth skin, with low calcium and high magnesium levels in their organs and soft tissues. They generally need high calcium intakes. This is the biochemistry of youth. As we age, we become more and more inflexible; this is most pronounced in old men and post-menopausal women.

The arteries harden to cause arteriosclerosis; the skeletal system calcifies to cause rigidity, with fusion of the spine and joints; kidneys and other organs and glands increasingly calcify and harden, with stone formation; calcification in the eyes causes cataracts; and even the skin hardens, becoming tough and wrinkled. In this way, calcium is in the same league as oxygen and free radicals, while magnesium works together with hydrogen and the antioxidants to keep the body structure soft.

While a higher magnesium intake is beneficial for most individuals, those with low blood pressure usually require more calcium. Normal blood pressure is about 120/80; the lower it is, the higher should be the daily intake of calcium. While those with high blood pressure may benefit from ingesting up to twice as much magnesium as calcium, those with low blood pressure may take twice as much calcium as magnesium, but both minerals in relatively high amounts. Those with low blood pressure and a tendency towards inflammation may also reduce their intake of phosphorus.

A gynaecologist reported that some of the first organs to calcify are the ovaries, leading to premenstrual tension. When he put his patients on a high magnesium intake, their PMT vanished and they felt and looked much younger. Most of these women said that they lost weight, increased their energy, felt less depressed and enjoyed sex again much more than before. For men, magnesium is equally beneficial for problems arising from an enlarged prostate gland. Symptoms commonly improve after a period of supplementation with magnesium chloride.¹⁹

Other Health Benefits

We see how essential magnesium is to the normal function of the cardiovascular and nervous systems as well as in over 300 enzyme reactions and in energy production. According to Mark Sircus:

Magnesium is the single most important mineral for maintaining proper electrical balance and facilitating smooth metabolism in cells. Magnesium is the second most abundant intracellular and the fourth most abundant cation (positively charged ion) in the body. It is a transmembrane and intracellular modulator of cellular electrical activity. As such, a deficiency in the body is nothing short of disastrous for the cell's life. Yet, this fact is not widely known.²⁰

And is it not at the cellular level that health and disease start?

Sircus also says: "Without magnesium there is no energy, no movement, no life."²¹

In practice, I often use the help of a reference software program called Hyperhealth (the definitive database for natural medicine based on published scientific research; see <http://www.hyperhealth.com>). It lists the health benefits that magnesium exerts on the different body systems, including the cardiovascular and nervous systems (as already stated) and the digestive, respiratory, excretory, lymphatic, immune, musculoskeletal, respiratory and reproductive systems, as well as on energy production.

It mentions magnesium's positive influence on metabolism such as in control of weight, blood sugar and cholesterol, and states that magnesium is needed for protein, starch and fat metabolism and is important in liver, thyroid and parathyroid function. It even lists benefits in hearing, vision and oral health.

The pathologies associated with magnesium deficiency are staggering: hypertension and other cardiovascular diseases, kidney and liver damage, migraine, multiple sclerosis, glaucoma, Alzheimer's disease, recurrent bacterial infections, fungal infections, premenstrual syndrome, calcium and potassium deficiency, diabetes, cramps, muscle weakness, impotence, aggression, fibromas, hearing loss and iron accumulation.²²

Increased magnesium intake helps to prevent or dissolve kidney stones and gall bladder stones.²³ Activation of digestive enzymes and bile production as well as improvement of intestinal flora health are factors that make magnesium chloride beneficial in normalising digestive processes and reducing digestive discomfort, bloating and offensive stool odours. It actually reduces all offensive body odours, including underarm and foot odour. This may explain why chlorophyll is generally very effective in reducing body odour, as it is high in magnesium.

I'd like to share some of my own clinical experiences with magnesium oil. I treated a patient with diet and supplements while she decreased her intake of anti-depressant drugs. She improved but still had a big problem with insomnia. Doing relaxation exercises and having a foot bath with added magnesium oil every night made her fall asleep while still soaking her feet!

Another client, after using magnesium oil for the first time, slept through the night without waking up with leg cramps. She also took magnesium chloride orally (note that as it is salty-bitter in taste, it is best taken mixed with juice).

Two friends of mine, after soaking their feet a few times, experienced a slight metallic taste in the throat. This can be interpreted as a sign of magnesium absorption into the system. Another person told me of dreaming much more than usual and waking up feeling refreshed after using magnesium oil. A colleague of mine reduced sun damage to his skin by applying magnesium oil. He recommended it to his clients and many had similar reports about their sun spots.

Some words of caution... Magnesium supplementation should be avoided if you have severe kidney problems (e.g., when on dialysis with severe renal insufficiency), and also with myasthenia gravis. Check your status with a medical professional. Be careful with severe adrenal weakness or with low blood pressure.

Too much magnesium can cause muscle weakness; if this happens, temporarily use more calcium. ∞

THE SERPENT AT THE END OF PRECESSION

Decades of scientific studies suggest that the Earth is heading for a reversal in polarity and spin, a change in obliquity relative to the Moon, and the beginning of the next ice age.

When the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change drafted the Kyoto Protocol and presented it in 1997 to world governments as a way to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in an effort to curb global warming, an international consensus was made to turn away from earlier concerns over evidence of a looming ice age.

According to Al Gore, global warming is a blame game: "We are melting the North Polar ice cap... We are destabilizing the massive mound of ice on Greenland... We are dumping so much carbon dioxide into the Earth's environment that we have literally changed the relationship between the Earth and the Sun."¹

The idea of global warming, however, runs contrary to official concerns going back at least 35 years. Stimulated by evidence of a cooling trend in the weather patterns, a 1973 report from the CIA concluded that "a global climatic change is taking place and that we will not soon return to the climate patterns of the recent past."² This was soon followed by the 1975 First Miami Conference on Isotope Climatology and Paleoclimatology, where Nobel laureate Willard R. Libby warned: "Ice ages have been the normal condition during the last several million years, with temperate climates enduring only five percent of the time... Because the global food supply depends primarily on climate, current understanding of climate must be vastly improved..."³

Over 30 years later, in a report released in 2004, the Pentagon was still expressing grave concern over the fears of a looming cool-down. While opting for either a scenario similar to the climate change of 8,200 years ago when the weather decayed for only 100 years or a scenario like the Younger Dryas event that cooled Earth for more than a 1,000-year period between circa 12,800 and 11,500 years BP, the report still found in the projected future "a significant drop in the human carrying capacity of the Earth's environment"⁴

Yet, amidst the crescendo of recent global warming soothsayers and the scramble to create carbon exchange proposals for CO₂-emitting industries, at least one geologist, Professor Richard A. Muller of the University of California, Berkeley, has sided with the Pentagon by saying "Our time looks about up" before this warm interglacial period comes to an abrupt termination.⁵

With a chart that shows three million years of temperature fluctuations based on oxygen isotope profiles, Professor Muller points out problematic discrepancies with the Milankovitch theory. Figure 1 shows that in the last 650,000 years the ice age was dominated by only the 100,000-year glacial cycle, that the previous two million years had a predominant 41,000-year cyclical pattern, and that around three million years ago there were no strong ice-age cycles at all.

What historians determine to be the total length of time it took for modern civilisation to develop is all within our present interglacial period. Sharp spikes in the graph not only illustrate how quickly ice ages can end, but also how quickly they can begin. "These data should frighten you...the next ice age is about to hit us," warns Professor Muller.⁶

Moon controls Earth's obliquity

A large part of the failure of climatologists to find a better explanation for ice ages is due to the application of the spinning-top model for Earth (which relies on the Earth still spinning from the momentum acquired during its formation) in the standard gravity-based universe model, rather than the more practical spinning-top model (where Earth's rotation is stimulated and perpetuated by a governing force of electromagnetism) in the electric universe model. A spinning top implies a single given momentum and a drag or torque against the axis of the spin.

This is a misleading image of Earth's rotational relationship to its orbital plane. The belief that Earth would not change rotational direction with a polarity reversal shows confusion if not denial of the properties of simple physics.

A gyroscopic effect model is closer to the real model, and even this can give the wrong image of Earth's stability. Due to the presence of the Moon, Earth's obliquity cannot go past the 23 degrees of the lunar orbit. What a gyroscopic model does best is illustrate the relationship of the Moon to the Earth's equatorial bulge, a suggestion of the lunar tidal drag against Earth's speed of rotation, and the cyclical changes in the Moon's own orbital plane which in turn controls the degree of Earth's obliquity.

But again, unlike a spinning top, Earth's tilt pivots on the solar plane that dissects Earth's equator, not its bottom axis. The torque against the axis that a spinning top will experience is not a proper representation of what is happening to Earth. The only torque on Earth's spin is caused by the Moon's influence against Earth's equator, an influence that absorbs and modifies additional influences by both the Sun and Jupiter.⁷

Fig. 1. Climate of the last three million years (arrow enhancements by the author). (Source: R. A. Muller and G. J. MacDonald, Ice Ages and Astronomical Causes, Praxis Publishing Ltd, Chichester, UK, 2000)

Even with known cyclical variations affecting this planet, Earth is very stable, its spin maintained by a solid, magnetically charged core which is surrounded by a substantial molten mantle. This liquid interior creates a strong and stable centrifugal force against the equator that is kept steady by the presence of the Moon, which subsequently acts as a climate regulator for the Earth.⁸

With the pivoting of the axis centred in the middle of the planet, some degree of polar wandering (axial tilt due to surface imbalances) is possible, but would be restricted within Earth's obliquity imposed upon the planet by the Moon. Any suggestion that the Earth could have turned on its side would suggest a point in time when the Earth didn't have a Moon.

The captured Moon and solar system

The idea of the Moon's relatively recent arrival is illustrated by one of the problems in the theory of "Snowball Earth". Buried in the Precambrian past is evidence of sand wedges in rock strata at the Mount Gunson copper mines in the Flinders Ranges, South Australia. Sand wedges show seasonal temperature fluctuations at a place where there shouldn't have been any during the Snowball period. For Australian geologist George Williams, the best explanation for the ice/thaw repetition that would cause sand wedges at the equator is an obliquity of our planet of nearly a quarter circle.⁹

This would imply a Precambrian Earth without a Moon. The Snowball Earth theory, rather than being challenged by Williams's findings, would be supported by the evidence of equatorial sand wedges—since an absence of the Moon during the Precambrian time period would have likely sent Earth into periods of extreme elliptical orbiting around the Sun, cooling the Earth incredibly while allowing the potential of obliquity to reach a maximum of 90 degrees, creating conditions best supporting periodic snowball conditions.

The best evidence for the geologically recent capture of the Moon is the Cambrian explosion circa 542 million years ago. Something happened that not only permanently ended the cycle of chilling conditions found on Earth's surface at the time, but also simultaneously put Earth into a stable orbit closer to the Sun, readjusted the crust and brought to an end the devastating swings in severe tilting or obliquity.

Mass extinction of Precambrian fauna is found at the boundary of the Cambrian and was determined to be caused by sudden environmental change.¹⁰

It would be the passing of the Sun through the galactic plane, something our solar system does repeatedly, and the subsequent though temporary collapse of planetary magnetic fields that would give rise to gravitational influences that could affect the potential shifting of astronomical bodies and at the very least threaten the dislodgement of comets from the Oort cloud.¹¹

In 1994, astronomers discovered a new galaxy very close to the Milky Way galaxy. Subsequent analysis showed the Milky Way to be devouring this smaller galaxy, now known as the Sagittarius Dwarf Elliptical Galaxy (Sag DEG). Significantly, it intersects the Milky Way at our solar system's precise angle and space.¹²

This coincidence would be less significant if our solar system weren't also moving at this same angle through the galaxy. It is acknowledged that our solar system passes through the galactic plane, usually described as a bobbing motion that takes anywhere from 33 million to 55 million years to be completed. There is no direct reason for this conjectured time limit or bobbing motion, other than a flawed attempt to match the movement of the solar system to known periods of surface cratering or extinction events.¹³

Considering the angle of the solar system and its given momentum, it is unlikely that the solar system bobs in any way with reference to the galactic plane. If the solar system were actually oriented relative to the galactic plane, it would be easier to accept the notion of a bobbing of the solar system along the galactic plane like the skipping of a rock on a pond's surface, but this is not the angular momentum that the Sun is known to have. Whether or not our solar system comes from Sag DEG, though it seems most likely, the Sun would have long ago passed through the Milky Way and just kept going if our solar system's journey had not somehow been captured, resulting in a galactic orbit that apparently takes the solar system through both galactic hemispheres in its full orbital cycle.

Ice age cycles and interglacial periods

Defining the length of this solar-galactic orbit leads back to the ice age cycle. Even though each warming period between glacial events is called an interglacial period, technically it is not—because an ice age cycle takes 650,000 years to complete. There are warming flux events in between glacial advancement (not the short interstadials, the warmer periods during a glaciation that last less than 10,000 years), but they are not the true interglacial periods.

We are not at the end of a glacial flux event currently, but in a true interglacial period that falls between a total ice age cycle and lasts only 13,000 years, or one half of the precession cycle. When Libby in 1975 said that temperate climates only endure for five per cent of an ice age, he was almost right. A real interglacial period—the length of time not between ice flux cycles but between one total ice age and the next—occupies about three per cent of the total cycle, while a warming flux—the warming period between glacial maximum events—can be 10 per cent or more of that cycle's duration.

Another look at Muller's graph of climate of the last three million years (fig. 1) shows that each glacial period associated with noticeable changes from the previous age is approximately 650,000 years in duration. Al Gore only took his graph of CO₂ concentrations back 650,000 years for a reason. The interglacial period which occurred beyond this point was so warm that there were hippopotamuses and hyenas in England.¹⁴

Between each ice age cycle of 650,000 years, polarity reversals cause continental shifting that forces Greenland to move further north while Europe spreads further east, each shift increasing the amount of warm Atlantic waters that reach the polar Arctic Ocean during the following glacial cycle.

The signature event that takes place like clockwork at the same 650,000-year period of time is the Yellowstone supervolcano eruption. Yellowstone is not random in its most violent eruption cycle and has marked the starting point for at least each of the last five ice ages. The apparent lack of sufficient gas and particulates in ice core samples shows that it is only associated with the start of each glacial period and is not the cause of it.

Yellowstone eruptions are very often associated with a significant jolt of the North American continent. The caldera itself doesn't move, but the plate over it does. This continental shift is sudden and reveals a repetition in the direction the continental interior has been moving for at least the last 13 million years (fig. 2).

Deformation in the Earth's crust prior to a polarity reversal is the reason Yellowstone can set the signature for each ice age cycle. As the solar system approaches the galactic plane, where magnetic fields collapse before reversing, the magnetic field of the Earth must similarly collapse before reversing.

In 2002, scientists observed a noticeable flattening of the poles but could not arrive at an appropriate explanation, citing post-glacial rebound, global warming-induced weather alterations and changes in gravity (!) as possible causes.¹⁵

Fluctuations in the strength of the magnetic field of the core allow centrifugal forces of molten magma to bulge more at the equator, resulting in a flattening of the planet at the poles and creating tremendous stresses for the lower and middle latitudes as they bear the brunt of crust misshaping. Yellowstone, being near the 45-degree latitude, is in essence right on the fold of crust deformity.

Since 2004, magma under Yellowstone has been rising from a chamber 30 miles beneath the surface to another chamber only six miles from the surface, and at a rate three times faster than previously recorded.¹⁶

Even if the idea of pinpointing a specific date, such as the much-maligned date of 2012, to a polarity reversal seems hard to accept, the fact that Earth is experiencing the collapse of its magnetic field is undeniable. Some research shows the strength of Earth's magnetic field to have been weakening for at least the last 4,000 years, while the measurement of Earth's magnetic field for the last 30 years shows field strength decline to be gaining momentum.¹⁷ At the point where the degrading magnetic pole falls into sync with the rotating pole of the axis, the gyroscopic model collapses into a spinning-top model and a polarity reversal will follow.

In a true interglacial period, that which lasts only 13,000 years and one of which we are now in, continental glacial sheets melt, Earth tilts to the obliquity set by the angle of the Moon's orbit, seasons begin and the planet spins counterclockwise as a negative polarity dictates. Precession, being a result of the Earth's obliquity, lasts only during this time. At the beginning of the next ice age, precession will end. Voltaire's Great Year (Plato knew nothing of precession) only ends up being a summer vacation.

Once Earth reverses its polarity from the one it has now and is rotating clockwise against the Moon's orbit, it will lose the Moon's influence of obliquity and its axis will become perpendicular. Clockwise rotation also results in pulling the Moon into a closer orbit, reversing its slow drift away from Earth.¹⁸

Being perpendicular would put Earth into a constant state of equinox (equal night), where night and day hours are the same from the poles to the equator. Charted seasonal insolation values show how this perpetual state of spring/autumn insolation, as shown by the readings in March and September, could support glacial build-up in the upper-middle and higher latitudes without a Milankovitch-style stretch of the ellipse (fig. 3).

A clockwise rotation for Earth would also reverse the oceanic currents, most significantly those of the Atlantic Ocean, which would now flow directly up the coast of Africa into the Arctic Ocean. This change in ocean currents would saturate the polar Hadley cell with moisture while creating a temperate climate in the Arctic. The Hadley cell would then carry and release its moisture in the mid-latitudes, below the northern jet stream.

On a world that doesn't spin, hot air at the equator would rise and flow toward the cooler polar regions where it would sink and flow along the ground until it reached the equator, where the cycle would begin all over again. Since our world does turn, this cycle of rising and sinking air is dragged across the irregularities of the surface and broken into three cells of rising and sinking air, like the stripes of Jupiter.

The cells that start at the equator and extend out 30 degrees on either side are called tropical Hadley cells, discovered and named by George Hadley in 1753. Between 30 and 60 degrees are the Ferrel cells, named after William Ferrel who discovered them in 1856. Ferrel cells are defined by the jet streams that flow at both the southern and northern boundaries. Above the Ferrel cell is the polar Hadley cell. Sitting directly on top of the polar region is a constant wind called the “polar vortex” that stays fixed above each pole.

Interestingly enough, the Pleistocene glacial sheets in America stop just below the northern jet stream, almost in a line across North America with an allowable dip to the west of the Great Lakes due to lake-effect snow. This is indicative of two things: a saturated jet stream and a lack of seasonal variation in the weather.

For ice sheets to grow as large as those found in the duration of the Pleistocene epoch (circa 1.2 million to 10,000 years BP), massive evaporation has to take place. This is the ignored conundrum of the ice age cycle. If glacial sheets crept down from the frozen polar regions, how did moisture get to the polar Hadley cells that fed the mid-latitude and northern glaciers?

From a detailed study of wind patterns, Professor Xiahong Feng of Dartmouth College, UK, the lead author of a report released in 2007, suggests that the dominant winds across North America during the Pleistocene came from the east. Analysis of ancient cellulose shows oxygen and hydrogen isotope levels highest on the East Coast while decreasing toward the West Coast—completely opposite of how the winds blow today, but exactly what would be expected with a clockwise rotation of the planet and a reversal of the present ocean currents and jet stream.¹⁹

Spinning clockwise and perpendicular, Earth now acts like a real spinning-top and, as such, the build-up of glacial sheets in the northern hemisphere along with declining sea levels in the southern hemisphere would make the planet respond to this imbalance in the same way a spinning top would.

With a top-heavy torque or drag against the rate of rotation, the weight of glacial sheets in the northern hemisphere could induce a pivoting of Earth on its southern pole or axis, causing Earth to respond with a slight bias toward the centre of its orbit, the Sun. This would not result in a return to precession as the pivoting of the bottom axis would leave Earth tilted toward the Sun in an annual continuity, not seasonally. The top-heavy northern land masses would lean toward the Sun only by a few degrees, bathed in perpetual light for thousands of years until the glaciers receded enough to refill the oceans and start the process all over again.

Ancient knowledge of polarity reversals

Illustrations from ancient Egypt showing Earth to have the cardinal points reversed may suggest knowledge of a polarity reversal and not necessarily the Earth's turning over.

Astronomical charts in the chamber of Hatshepsut's architect Senmut show this, as do documents from the Harris, the Ipuwer and the Hermitage papyri.²⁰

In this perpendicular position of Earth's axis, the pole star sits in the Draco constellation. All prehistoric people above the equator were overseen by the constant presence of this Serpent.

A clockwise rotation will change the length of the year, month and day. Eliminating the wobble of the barycentre caused by the Moon will also equalise and better distribute the tidal drag, causing Earth to speed up slightly.

This change in calendar length is confirmed by fossilised tidal patterns at Pichi Richi in the southern Flinders Ranges, South Australia, where geologist George Williams determined that at the Precambrian–Cambrian boundary the solar year lasted 13 months and the day just under 22 hours.²¹

A reflection of this ancient calendar and its close proximity to this interglacial period can be found in the ancient Tarot card system where the Major (Sun) Arcana represents the 22 hours in the ice-age day and the Minor (Moon) Arcana shows the 56 lunar weeks in a year. The early disuse of the 56 Aubrey holes of Stonehenge may also illustrate the revamping of old knowledge.

Removing one card from each suit of the Minor Arcana set (to become the common playing cards that we know today) reflected a readjustment of the number of lunar months and total weeks in the new calendar year. However, totally remaking the symbolisms for the changes in the hours of the day was harder with the Major Arcana and didn't show up until the creation of the 24 Elder Futhark runes.

Runes researcher Audrey Fletcher argues that the Elder Futhark has ancient Egyptian origins and records the discovery of precession. In order to interpret their true meaning properly, the 24 runes must be arranged and read, contrary to the Tarot's Major Arcana, in a counterclockwise direction.²²

Descent of the mesosphere

At the termination of the last ice age, ice sheets were the biggest yet. The domination of the 100,000-year periods of glacier building removed so much water from the oceans that ocean levels dropped by an approximate 300 feet at the equator and by up to 400 feet in the Arctic.

As Earth passed through the galactic plane 13,000 years ago, a tremendous event occurred in the Arctic that changed the topography and wiped out most of the extensive herds of mammals of the Arctic plains.

Underlying much of the Arctic landscape is a frozen muck filled with the remains of various Pleistocene mammals, bugs and plants. A catastrophic and unrecognised weather phenomenon occurred at the moment of the pole shift and reversed within the length of a day the temperate Arctic landscape of the Pleistocene into the frozen one that we know today.

Whitley Strieber first coined the term "global superstorm" in the book The Coming Global Superstorm, co-authored with Art Bell.²³ It is a term he used to describe the fictional scenario of the collapse of the North Atlantic oceanic current, resulting in extremely frigid air rushing out of the Arctic, causing tremendous storms worldwide as a result.

His idea is based on an anomaly that occurred at the end of the Pleistocene, in an event known by geologists as the Younger Dryas, when the Atlantic conveyor collapsed. This thermohaline circulation shutdown, in association with a change in tropical winds, plunged parts of Europe and North America into an extended period of cooling, in essence reversing the warming effects that had arrived with the ending of the ice age.²⁴

However, this incident did not create a global winter, unlike in Strieber's scenario, as it only delayed glacial melting for a thousand years and impacted mainly northern Europe and parts of North America.²⁵

A real global superstorm as Strieber envisioned would involve a rare event unrecognised by modern science and unprecedented in the history of modern meteorology.

Above each pole, north and south, far above the swirling winds of the polar vortex, is a pocket of extremely frigid air in the layer of atmosphere known as the mesosphere. Here, allowing for seasonal variations, temperatures can range from -90 to -125 °C (-130 to -193 °F).²⁶

The mesosphere has cooled at an estimated one degree per year over the last 30 years. It has also dropped eight kilometres in its ceiling and is predicted to drop another 20 kilometres within the next century. Oddly enough, the increased chilling of the mesosphere is found to be related to increases in greenhouse gas emissions.²⁷

A descent of this frigid mesospheric temperature to the surface happens when the Hadley and Ferrel cells collapse at the time that Earth stops and reverses rotation—a truly global superstorm finally realised. Even modified by polar surface temperatures, a descending mesosphere will bring temperatures to Earth's surface in excess of -73.3 °C (-100 °F). The initial descent of the mesosphere at the end of the last ice age would also have resulted in extreme differences in pressure gradients and created winds beyond our currently defined hurricane parameters, with a force that would have disarticulated—and, indeed, did disarticulate—much of what it swept up, as evidence shows in parts of the Alaskan and Siberian landscapes.^{28,29}

Today, a superstorm will not be confined by one- and two-mile-high glaciers circumventing the northern latitude. Passage through the galactic plane at the end of this type of interglacial period is far more destructive than at the end of a glacial period. The high ocean levels will intrude many miles inland as Earth reverses rotation, and the eruption of Yellowstone will eliminate any effective response the United States might be expected to make on the domestic or international scene.

If this arrival of the next ice age is anything like the ending of the last ice age, then the modern human species, as unprepared as it is for this event, seems most likely to follow the same path as the woolly mammoth. ∞

Interview with Vladimir Megré

In the following interview (written for the online monthly newspaper The Earth), US-based Dr Regina Jensen talks with Vladimir Megré, author of The Ringing Cedars book series, about what he has learnt from Anastasia—the beautiful, wise, reclusive young woman who caused him to give up his lucrative business to record her life-changing wisdom. His books are now bestsellers read all over the world. — Editor

Regina Jensen (RJ): Vladimir Nikolaevich, I would first like to ask you a philosophical question. You are a well-known person and writer with worldwide acclaim. Your books are sold in great numbers throughout the world; yet you live modestly, not surrounded with luxuries as is often the case with world-renowned celebrities. Can you explain why you differ from others in that respect?

Vladimir Megré (VM): I consider it senseless and even unethical to own large apartments filled with a multitude of objects if you yourself cannot be constantly in contact with them and fill them with your aura.

I sometimes visit my acquaintances, who have houses with twelve rooms and more. They have a servant, a cook, a gardener, but in their home one does not feel that invisible warmth that the surrounding space may give a person if the person is in direct contact and personal communication with this space. A hired gardener is involved with the garden, not with love but for money; a cleaning woman will hardly clean furniture and vacuum the floors with love—but they are the main persons responsible for that living space, not the owners. Even a highly qualified cook is not able to prepare the type of food that can be made by one's own grandmother, mother or beloved woman. Food made by a stranger will not have the same energy or force as food made by people close to you, who truly love you. That is why I live in a small apartment on the edge of the city. Twenty metres from the loggia of the apartment is a pine forest.

I feel that the best place in my dwelling is my office, where there is a portrait of Anastasia, a picture portraying her parents and other pictures. There is a carved desk and chair of Siberian cedar, brought from the taiga, made by talented Siberian craftsmen. I work at this desk. I sleep on a couch in the same office. I believe that a person should have the type of dwelling that he himself can fill with his aura, and with which he can be in a kindly relationship. Then it will return to him its love. If strangers work in a person's dwelling, they can leave behind their energy, which is not always wholesome for the owner. Understanding this, I do not strive to have a luxurious apartment with a lot of rooms.

RJ: That is a very touching and unusual way to consider and describe personal space, Vladimir Nikolaevich. Thank you! Regarding money, I know also that you send your personal funds to finance social projects, and you even gave up your country home to establish an art gallery. I understand all too well that for a person like you, money cannot be an end in itself. Even though, I am interested in your personal thoughts about money.

VM: In actuality, no one really needs money. But in the conditions of the virtual world in which modern society finds itself, the virtual value of banknotes provides for real, everyday necessities. These are, of course, different for everyone. The royalties I receive personally are completely sufficient for my everyday needs. But when I accumulate more money, I will direct it to the creation of feature films, which I hope will help me and many others to define our destiny in space and time as we conceive it. In general, I have a balanced attitude toward money. I certainly don't worship it.

RJ: Vladimir Nikolaevich, currently many people are discussing "the Megré phenomenon". You became involved in business as an ordinary photographer, without any initial capital or education in economics, and in a short time you became chairman of the Association of Siberian Entrepreneurs, a businessman known throughout Russia. You suddenly gave up business, all your savings, and began to write books, while having no specialised education and no money to publish the first edition.

And again, in a relatively short period of time you have become a well-known writer in modern Russia and all the countries of the former Soviet Union. The ideas contained in your books are discussed at the highest levels of power, and the name Vladimir Megré is frequently at the centre of social and political conversations.

Moreover—correct me if I am wrong—your books have been translated into 20 languages and their total circulation is more than 11 million copies. The ideas described in your books have found response in the souls of people living in the USA, Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Germany, United Kingdom and many other countries. Your creative work is compared to the work of the "later" Tolstoy [following his spiritual awakening], and John Woodsworth, a Canadian researcher and poet, has written an interesting paper in this regard. Tell me, how do you, yourself, explain "the Megré phenomenon"? I would imagine that so much fame can be quite a burden.

VM: Fame is not a burden. It does, after all, have a life of its own, beyond the walls of my office. When I walk along the street, I in no way draw attention to the fact that I am a writer, which allows me to observe life around me. I do not consider myself a phenomenon or special in any way. I was the most ordinary businessman, made trade expeditions on ships down rivers into the heart of Siberia, and did not have any spiritual or moral goals before me. It was simply thanks to fate that I ended up at the right place at the right time.

The Wisdom of Anastasia

VM: Imagine a deserted bank of the Siberian Ob River, thousands of kilometres from our so-called civilisation. On the bank stands a woman in an old jacket, long skirt, wearing rubber galoshes, and so wrapped up in a shawl that only her eyes are visible. I was looking for a guide who could show me the path leading to the place in the taiga where the ringing cedar grew. So I approached her. She answered that you had to walk twenty-five kilometres across the taiga to get there, and she agreed to take me.

This woman's name, as it later turned out, was Anastasia.

She, just as many researchers now consider, is indeed the most unusual phenomenon of our time—and not only because she was born and lives in the heart of the Siberian taiga. Recluses are also found in other places on Earth. But Anastasia possesses some mysterious abilities and knowledge of the primogenitors. She considers the basic science to be the science of imagery—knowledge that was partially possessed by the priests of ancient Egypt. The curing of all kinds of diseases and teleportation are not at all the most important of her abilities. As shown by later events, she is able to design the future and, following her thoughts, this future begins to materialise in the real circumstances of our lives. In doing so, she asserts that every person living on Earth possesses these same abilities. They begin to manifest themselves in people in a certain way of life.

During the first hours of our meeting, Anastasia did not in any way differ from the ordinary dwellers of the Siberian backwoods. More probably she very skilfully disguised herself as one of them. And I had a feeling of superiority over the ordinary woman walking in front of me along the path through the taiga. After all, at that time I was a well-known businessman, travelling in a comfortable boat, and who was she?

But at a stop, when I decided to have a rest and quench my thirst, the first startling event occurred. The woman refused to share my meal, went off by herself, took off her shawl and outer clothing down to a short summer dress, and laid down on the grass under the weak rays of the Sun.

When I tore myself away from my meal and glanced at her, I was struck by what I saw. On the grass was lying an uncommonly beautiful woman, about twenty-three, with long, golden hair. The features of her face were regular, her well-tended skin did not at all resemble the weather-beaten faces of the dwellers of the Siberian backwoods. She had large, kind, grey-blue eyes, and lips that smiled slightly. An unusual energy emanated from her lithe body, which could be felt even at a distance of several metres. And it felt as if the Sun's rays, touching her body, were transformed into some kind of bewitching energy that caressed the space around her. She was wearing a short, light dress, somewhat resembling a nightshirt, but one had the impression that her body was not cold.

"As shown by later events, she is able to design the future and, following her thoughts, this future begins to materialise in the real circumstances of our lives."

I spent three days in the taiga together with Anastasia, but had the sensation that I had passed through several lifetimes—and, moreover, in different dimensions. At the beginning, to a greater extent I was struck by the mode of life of this recluse of the taiga: at her gesture, squirrels place dried mushrooms and cedar nuts at her feet, and she sometimes plays with a she-wolf as with a pet dog. Not all animals of the taiga serve Anastasia devotedly—only those that live on her territory. But this did not turn out to be the main thing.

The phenomenon of Anastasia lies in the fact that she is able to reproduce pictures of her family's life, beginning with the creation of the Earth. I did not accidentally use the word "reproduce". When she speaks of the life of her distant forefathers of tens of thousands of years in the past, then vivid pictures of these distant events arise. These pictures are much better than those on a television screen. It is as if holograms appear in space and the scents and sounds of the distant past are experienced. Researchers suppose that, in theory, pictures of the past of one's family can be seen by each person through genetic memory. However, the hustle-and-bustle of modern life does not allow a person to do this, and perhaps these abilities for most people have been lost—as have, by the way, many other abilities.

RJ: To me, Vladimir Nikolaevich, it all rang true right away, but my husband said wistfully: "It all sounds too good to be true. If only that could be our reality." How do readers really know, unless they have a deep inner response themselves?

VM: It is difficult to verify the authenticity of Anastasia's stories about the past. However, the logic in her stories is greater than the logic in official historical works, and Anastasia's construction of the pictures of people's lives in the future is beginning to come true, even in detail. According to Anastasia, the future of humanity is seen as amazingly beautiful. However, this future is based not on so-called scientific and technological progress but on a profound knowledge of the natural world.

She considers the modern method of conquering outer space using spaceships to be primitive, irrational and impossible on a sufficiently serious scale. Mankind can settle distant planets and create life on them only by using our psychotelepathic abilities, which will develop in proportion to the construction of a perfected way of life for people on planet Earth.

Anastasia has an unusually rapid speed of thought. She may exceed the speed of the most modern computers many times over. For example, in response to the question, "What is the main source of air pollution in large cities?", she gazed for several minutes in her own individual way, analysed the situation in the cities of the entire world and answered: "Smoke coming from the tailpipes of the cars moving in the city and leaving on the roads tiny particles of their wheels." Of course, information about cars as the main source of air pollution in large cities is widely known, but attention has not been drawn to the tiny particles of rubber from the tyres rubbing on the asphalt.

But further, in only several minutes Anastasia had analysed the vast number of alternative ways of cleaning the harmful dust from the air of large cities, and offered, in her words, the most rational solution. She suggested placing beneath the bottom of each car a small [elongated] box which would collect the harmful particles while the car was moving. This method has not been referred to anywhere, but, using it, it would be possible to collect tens of tonnes of the harmful substance from the streets of modern large metropolises. I would be happy if it were used in America.

Creating Kin's Domains

RJ: Anastasia's philosophy, her descriptions of our reality today, her story and, more precisely, the image she creates of the wonderful future of Russia and the entire world have given rise to an unbelievable phenomenon in society. I understand that hundreds of thousands of people, not waiting for instructions from above or government financing, have embarked, on their own initiative, on making this created image a reality. Is that true?

VM: Yes. Anastasia believes that every family should have its own parcel of land with an area of no less than a hectare. This parcel, which the recluse from the taiga calls a "Kin's domain", should be transformed by the family into a living, heavenly oasis that answers all of a person's needs. A person's level of spiritual development is represented by the appearance of his living creation and the person's way of life in it.

She considers it totally unacceptable to bury members of a family in cemeteries. They should be buried only on Kin's domains. Then the spirits of the deceased relatives will not suffer from the fact that their bodies have been discarded, as into waste pits far from their relations, in a cemetery. But on the contrary, buried in Kin's domains their souls will help and protect the people living in the domains. Analogous to our modern ones, cemeteries existed in antiquity as well, but they were intended for animals that had died of diseases and criminals without families.

Anastasia speaks about how to lay out and develop one's Kin's domain so that, using it, it would be possible to rid oneself of physical ailments. She also speaks about the ancient and very beautiful wedding ceremony in a fair bit of detail—a ceremony through which the young couple, by the force of their thoughts, create the plan for their future Kin's domain, and at the very moment of the marriage, with the participation of their parents, relatives and friends, that which they thought about materialises in several minutes. Anastasia asserts that, for young couples who create their Kin's domains in this manner, love will never pass away. Moreover, it will become stronger with the years, and she explains why this occurs: "When a husband looks at his wife, he subconsciously identifies her both with his wonderful domain and with his child, who—this is also essential—should be born on the domain."

This is something to believe in. After all, for each person, the very best place in the world remains his or her own small homeland. The most beautiful and the best of the children of the entire world will always be his or her child.

Anastasia also asserts that, if all people or the majority of them begin consciously to create their Kin's domains, turning them into heavenly oases, then the entire world will be transformed. Natural cataclysms and wars will not occur on Earth. When the inner, spiritual world of a person changes, new knowledge and abilities will be opened to him or her. A person may create wonderful worlds analogous to our Earthly world on other planets.

RJ: Vladimir Nikolaevich, this all sounds so very amazing and encouraging. But we have many people, especially many authorities, who would not want people to have this information and criticise not only you but anyone who would believe Anastasia's philosophies.

VM: The official critics may approach the subjects of the books and pronouncements of the recluse from the taiga in various ways, but their opinions are not really that important now. The most important critics—the people—have expressed their positive opinion in tens of thousands of letters and hundreds of thousands of emails. They have expressed themselves not only with words but also with concrete actions. The hundreds of large and small settlements that have sprung up and continue to spring up all across Russia are confirmation of that.

RJ: Is that incredibly positive response all over the world not somewhat of a miracle in itself?

VM: Yes. It is here that a riddle arises—a riddle that for the time being remains unsolvable and mysterious. If this mass movement has been provoked by only the pronouncements of this recluse from the taiga quoted in books, what force is hidden behind her phrases? It is possible that they are constructed in such a way that the letters form a certain code. It is possible that a certain rhythm of her phrases has significance.

Anastasia usually tries to attune herself to the manner of speech of her interlocutor, using his vocabulary and way of constructing phrases, but at certain moments she suddenly begins to speak another language, categorically smooth and rhythmic. She very precisely articulates each letter of the phrases she pronounces, and an unusual energy is felt after each sound. And then what she has said is remembered word for word, as if a tape recorder is operating in one's mind. And moreover, vivid pictures arise before the listener, and the meaning of what was said is assimilated by the subconscious.

As an example, I quote an excerpt of God's conversation with the first man in Anastasia's re-telling: "Where is the edge of the universe? What will I do when I come to it, when I myself fill everything, and have created everything I have conceived?" the first of the primogenitors asks God, and receives this answer: "My son. The Universe itself is a thought, a thought from which was born a dream, which is partially visible as matter. When you approach the edge of all creation, your thought will reveal a new beginning and continuation. From obscurity will arise the new and resplendent birth of you, and it will reflect in itself your soul, your dreams, your whole aspirations. My son, you are infinite, you are eternal. Within you are your dreams of creation."

The future of the Earth as designed by Anastasia appears fabulously wonderful. People who are transforming it into reality are for the time being living it in their dreams, but I believe that their dreams will definitely materialise.

Countering Negative Rumours

RJ: In your creative work, you touch on the most painful social problems. In many respects you uncover the causes giving rise to these problems, and also for whom they are profitable. Of course, for a person like you there exist people who envy you and wish you ill, who try in every way possible to slander you, spread scandals and dream up the most absurd stories about you.

So, in English-speaking countries, among your readers the rumour has spread, and is being maintained, that you abandoned Anastasia, periodically drink heavily and have found a young lover! Would you please comment on these allegations? Also, Vladimir Nikolaevich, should that happen again, might you have some helpful suggestions for your readers so that they might know how to protect themselves from these types of hurtful rumours?

"When the inner, spiritual world of a person changes, new knowledge and abilities will be opened to him or her. A person may create wonderful worlds analogous to our Earthly world on other planets."

VM: Negative rumours have been circulating about me for as long as ten years. In all this, the mass media have been used and exploited in the most active manner. I live in Russia. Once, when I was sitting in my garden beneath an apple tree and working on my next book, a neighbour came up to me in the garden with a newspaper in his hands and said: "Vladimir, you're sitting here, but the newspaper writes that you live in an Egyptian palace, surrounded by Mafia gunmen, that you operate a totalitarian sect and that the readers of your books are going out of their minds."

I didn't have to explain anything to my neighbour; he saw with his own eyes that the newspaper was printing a lie. But after only several days, this same article was reprinted by a number of newspapers, including one Canadian newspaper. The Russian District Court told my lawyers that the newspaper had said nothing insulting; the journalist had simply expressed his opinion, and he had the right to do so. But this journalist had not even met with me. The editor of the Canadian newspaper, after Canadian readers appealed to him, and without the intervention of a court, made public apologies.

Regarding the sharing of this special material, there seems to be an overt, concerted effort not to permit society to discuss the ideas and suggestions set out in the books regarding modern man's urgent need to improve their way of living. The libellous publications never earnestly discuss the issues raised in the books, but speak in uninformed generalities and degrading terms about me and my readers.

Even the priests of ancient Egypt understood all too well that images rule the world. An image is a great energy that is capable of having an influence on a slave and a pharaoh in equal measure—through all time and space. We have much scientific research which confirms all this now. Anastasia, the recluse from the taiga, to all appearances has a brilliant command of the science of imagery, and modern priests are not succeeding and will not succeed in overcoming her powerful, positive and living images.

RJ: Yes, as we said earlier, someone like Anastasia, and you along with her, must be like big thorns in the sides of many individuals of power who prefer that we remain the blind and dull-witted masses and not come into the God-given powers of which you and Anastasia remind us so powerfully.

VM: I myself think that the point is not only the ideas, but most likely their exposition in Anastasia's language. Judge for yourself. All of us have known for a long time that drinking and smoking are not good, that breathing fresh air is more wholesome, more pleasant, and that pure water is more beneficial for our health. However, we continue to live in ecologically unhealthy and destructive large metropolises, and the heroes of the majority of the most popular television series—social models for many people—spend their leisure time in bars and discotheques.

But all of a sudden, people did hear truths that have long been known, and the truths are inspiring them at last to take concrete, real actions. So some kind of great power must have been concealed in the spiritual impulses of Anastasia, and this power seemingly overcomes the darkness that has conquered the world.

RJ: No wonder that there is a struggle against Anastasia's tangible, inspiring ideas and philosophy.

VM: Yes. In this instance, the spreading of all sorts of rumours about me is an ultimately futile subterfuge to distract people away from the main issues at hand. Moreover, even in the first book I disclosed about myself that I had definitely not been a saint, that I used to drink, smoke, flirt with women and be overinvolved with my business. But I've changed. Yes, the blood of the businessman can still begin to rush; only now, it is not like before.

I am very proud that, with the help of my daughter and son-in-law, I have been able to set up the production of cedar oil according to Anastasia's technology. And I think there are not many products in the world equal to it. For a long time I was unable to bring it up to the quality of Anastasia's oil, even though the modern technology of a medicinal compounds factory was used. But it soon became clear that it was impossible to obtain the required quality in the city, and it then became necessary to transfer the production to a village in the taiga 100 kilometres from the city—and it worked out.

With regard to Anastasia, she is always with me, in my heart, in my soul.

The Promise of a New Book

RJ: Vladimir Nikolaevich, readers will never forgive me if I do not ask you some questions about your new book. Could you tell us about some of the topics you touch on in the new book?

VM: In the new book, I shall be speaking about the power of human thought as the most powerful energy in the universe.

RJ: What are your favourite parts of the book?

VM: I always like to write about something good: even

"So some kind of great power must have been concealed in the spiritual impulses of Anastasia, and this power seemingly overcomes the darkness that has conquered the world."

vitality and mood improve, and aches and pains disappear, when you write about something good, about the victory of good. In the new book I also talk about my children, about the ice age, when people left their familiar areas and, like a little girl, attempted to stop the glacier.

RJ: Vladimir, has Anastasia discussed things that were completely new for you?

VM: Yes, she has, but they are not always comprehensible or they seem insignificant. For example, she says that humanity has not yet determined the purpose and meaning of its existence, and claims that human existence lies in the perfection of the natural, living environment. She had said that a long time ago, but I did not write it because I supposed that the living environment included, for example, an apartment or domain, and that this did not involve spirituality.

However, in further conversations it became clear that by "living environment" she understands not only a Kin's domain, even a perfect one, but the entire universe, and she says how a person can, in perfecting his or her living environment, protect the Earth even from meteorites and make the universe a more comfortable place in which to live. By perfecting his or her living environment, a person perfects himself or herself as well as his or her own body and spirit.

RJ: That does sound fascinating. Has she given you any other information that has appeared very strange to you?

VM: Rather than strange, it was not completely understandable. For example, she has several times tried to tell how a person, when dying, may not die, or, to put it another way, when falling asleep may wake up in a new body. She tells it in a more detailed way than I do. But sometimes in doing so she uses words that are not found in our vocabulary. As a result I cannot set this out in comprehensible language, so we speak about this topic again. I sometimes ask Anastasia: "Translate the words you are saying into a more understandable language." She answers: "They cannot be translated into your modern language; I am probably illiterate in translations." And she laughs. But I know that she is extremely literate.

RJ: Sometimes Anastasia has a very serious attitude toward certain scenes that she wants you to write. Did something similar happen in this book?

VM: Yes, it did. But, in general, when she speaks about something significant that she herself believes deeply, then she adopts an especially unusual construction for her phrases. For example, in the book Co-creation, when she speaks about the interrelationships of the energy of Love with God, everything she says sounds like pure verse, and one can remember the entire book not simply word for word but one sees pictures depicting what's said.

RJ: What is Anastasia's basic goal in this book for the readers?

VM: I did not specifically ask what her goal is. Intuitively, I myself feel that she desperately wants to do something good for people, to remind humanity of some forgotten knowledge or feelings. She is prepared to call down fire on herself, and for that reason she says: "Woe unto you, Nostradamus! The dates of the fearful cataclysms upon the Earth were not so much your divinations as the creations of your thought. You made millions of people persuade themselves of these by what you taught and thereby aim their thoughts at the implementation of the same. Your thought still hovers up there, hiding in the blue, still frightening people with your prophecies of despair, but now they will no longer come true. Let your thoughts join into fray with mine. Of course, you knew all this ahead of time, and that is why you are so eager to flee away." Or another: "Prepare yourself, all wickedness and evil-mindedness, to leave the Earth behind and fall upon me!"

RJ: Thank you very much, Vladimir Nikolaevich, for the time you have given to your English-speaking readers. We are all impatiently waiting to hear more! ∞

FEARS FOR INVENTOR OF WAVE ENERGY GENERATOR

A man by the name of Stefan Nyström has invented a way to generate energy from ocean waves that he claims would cost five per cent of what coal energy does.

He set up a prototype in Ghana and, initially, claims to have found many potential investors. However, suddenly problems started to pop up. The investors, originally extremely enthusiastic, started to back off. He was offered bribes in order to quit. Finally, he began to be harassed by Ghanaian police and mercenaries.

He contacted me in the hope of getting protection. I told him to come to Japan. He told me he was not allowed to leave the country. He said they had taken parts from his prototype. I said I would see what I could do.

Before I could do anything, yesterday I received a disturbing set of phone calls from a very scared-sounding Mr Nyström. "They tried to kill me three times today," he screamed into the phone. Then I lost contact with him, and his phone has been switched off.

In his last call, he asked me to make his technology public. So, here below is a description of his technology. Would people please pass it on and would as many people as possible, in a tribute to a man who has probably been killed by mercenaries hired by the oil industry, make sure that prototypes are developed.

THE WAVEREAPER™ TECHNOLOGY

by Stefan Nyström © 2008

Waves work in a constant movement, up and down, forth and back, and we can take advantage of this in a cheap way with the WaveReaper™, a simple mechanical device. As we said, the waves move up and down, but most generators rotate around an axle, and the wave size varies a lot and creates problems when you want to utilise their energy content. The current technologies regarding wave energy today are very costly and can't compete with other ways of making energy.

Another factor to consider with water and generators is that, yes, almost any technology has a problem when it comes to the ocean's salt water unless more expensive designs and materials are used. Water can leak inside equipment and ruin electrical circuits, which therefore must be safeguarded against corrosion and also against leakage and pressure in those cases when the equipment is under water. In other words, underwater technology, with all these problems to solve, means high costs and therefore more expensive energy for the consumer. This is not what we would like, so to solve the wave generation concept we need to get around these problems.

The solution is simple: we can use basic items such as wire, plastic barrels, one-way bearings, a pulley, an axle, a flywheel and a generator. These are the main components in what, up to today, is the cheapest wave energy technology in the world. It can even be built in wood or with bicycle parts! This is very good in countries which have limited access to expensive metals and heavy machining tools. Except for wiring, most of the parts in the generator can be made of wood or plastic. [See fig. 1.]

We use a set of plastic barrels as buoys; the cost is low, and PVC isn't affected by salty ocean water. The barrels are placed near shore or further out in deeper water, depending on the amount of energy needed in a particular wave plant.

Each barrel has a lifting force of approximately 100 kilograms. A wire is connected to the barrel, which goes to a brass block on the bottom, which is weighted down with a big stone and connected to another wire. [See figs. 2 and 3.]

The location of choice is the main parameter for the size of the barrels: smaller waves, then smaller barrels and vice versa. Wave heights that can be utilised can be two feet and upwards.

The number of barrels can be larger, but I think, for practical reasons, 100 on each plant would be good and reasonable. In the shoreline version, this number can give up to 500 kW of energy, and even more in special locations. A plant that covers 100 metres of shoreline can give 3 MW per kilometre of shoreline.

The barrels are positioned at two metres' distance from each other and Figure 3. Reverse half-pipe makes it possible to haul gear without divers. The pipe is mounted on the wire, and the block section is further lengthened out into the sea until the required distance from the shore has been reached. When service is required, the pipe is mounted off from the wire and the block section is hauled to the shoreline. No divers or loading service personnel are needed. Round pipe is mounted around the wire. A half-pipe is mounted around the top of the wire. The next half-pipe is mounted the other way to the wire.

connected to the land-based WaveReaper generator via the power-transmitting wire. The barrels are also connected by a thinner wire between them so that if the power wire should break, the barrels don't drift away in the sea. This also evens out the possibility that the barrels would smash into each other when the sea is rougher.

Rough weather capabilities

The lifting capacity also sets a maximum power input into the device, since if a wave is too fast or large, the barrel would not lift more than it can, and forces are kept within the range chosen when constructing the WaveReaper plant.

Rough waves are a problem for all wave-energy constructions. However, the WaveReaper has a built-in safety feature in its construction that avoids damage to the equipment: the barrels have a maximum lifting force, so they will sink under the surface if the force of the waves is too great. This makes it possible for the WaveReaper to work in any weather. However, for the best cost-benefit ratio, the plant should be constructed to take advantage of medium-sized waves that are present most of the time.

Power output and cost

With 10 barrels in each row and 10 rows, the plant would take up 20 x 20 metres of area, or 400 m², and have 100 connected wires which transfer the mechanical energy to the generator. [See fig. 4.] This type of plant gives 100 to 300 kW every hour, which would generate profits of US$6,500 to $20,000 of revenue monthly. The cost of building the plant is estimated to be only $20,000. This means that the WaveReaper can pay for itself in a few months instead of years.

I have chosen to use only cheap materials in this demonstration, because of the need to bring down production costs and make it possible to build this type of wave generation device anywhere in the world and with local materials, e.g., car parts, which don't need to be imported. Other materials, of course, could be used, but the schematic for the design would be different. Simple is better, it is said, and fewer parts and bearings bring down the cost of building and also repair.

WaveReaper set-up and action

This is a simple schematic showing buoys, wire and a one-way bearing connected together. [See fig. 5.] The wire is connected to a chain in the end, which works on a gearwheel sitting on a one-way bearing mounted on an axle. This translates the pulling force of the wire to a circular movement. Wire of 4-mm stainless steel is good, providing a lifting ability of approximately 300 kg before it breaks.

The plastic that's best to use is PVC, which has high strength and is also light and cost-effective. Of course, the UV light from the Sun will affect it in the long run, but the part that is in the water should be somewhat protected from UV rays.

The flywheel is mounted on the axle to collect, even out and store the momentum produced by the lifting barrel. This will even out and smooth the turnings of the axle to the generator, which is driven by a pulley, which will give it the correct rpm. A simple brake, which can never wear down, is also planned, in which case a constant current generator or a special electronic device is not used.

Pipes are mounted on the wire, which means we can haul each device in and out without leaving the shoreline. With this configuration, if one set of barrels malfunctions, only 10 per cent of the plant's output is lost. It can be hauled in to the shore and serviced with ease, without complicated offshore operations.

With the wire coming to the generator housing, a chain is mounted to the wire, which drives the gear wheel and the one-way bearing, which makes the chain draw when a wave raises the barrel but lets it spin back freely when the wave height goes down. Also, a small weight is connected to the chain to make it even out slack in the wire. The flywheel is mounted and a pulley drives the generator evenly.

A one-way bearing with pulley and wire but with bigger loads, chain and gearwheel is an option. A one-way bearing can be seen in the example of a bicycle; it rotates freely in one direction but grips in the other direction and transfers force. This principle is used in the WaveReaper, making it simple and cost-effective.

A wave's up-and-down movement is translated to rotating movement, suited for a generator of choice. The barrels, of course, will jump up and down in random patterns; this will add to an even movement of the generator axle and its flywheel. As soon as a wave has energy to contribute, it will transmit its force to the wire and to the axle. The flywheel temporarily stores the momentum gained from the waves.

Because of its design, the WaveReaper is always self-adjusting for wave height, tidal shifts and higher or lower water levels due to shifting weather patterns. No adjustment is needed: the WaveReaper is always balancing itself out to optimal level in the ocean.

It's time for things to change in the world's energy sector. The oil-based economy is gone. Let's all accept it, and build a better world, feed the hungry, cure the sick and, of course, stop polluting the environment with oil-based, stone-age technology. ∞

CELESTIAL PROPHECIES AND THE GREAT PYRAMID

The gods and goddesses of Egypt, and the sages of other ancient cultures, left a legacy of prophecies and myths concerning cosmic cataclysms with major repercussions for Earth.

Curious watermark on the Great Pyramid

Unfortunately for the development of our story, Masoudi does not give the date of the lifetime of King Saurid Ibn Salhouk, saying only that he lived 300 years before a huge flood. This Arabic legend is one of many that conserve a tradition concerning the coming of a great deluge and attempts by leaders to preserve important information from its catastrophic effects.

The external inscriptions on the Great Pyramid were the original and main source of extraordinary celestial knowledge, and that is probably one reason why the structure was built. It is important to remember that records of the ancient mystery schools insist that many Egyptian structures were constructed "partly to provide permanent Halls of Initiation, but also to act as treasure-house and shrine for some great talisman of power during a submergence which Initiates knew was impending" (W. Scott-Elliot, The Story of Atlantis, preface to the first edition by A. P. Sinnett, 1896, p. 38).

The conclusion reached is that the record of "sea shells...calcified high" on the Great Pyramid, as written by Herodotus over 2,400 years ago, is evidence that the structure was erected before the deluge—a theory substantiated by Arabic traditions that have been too often disparaged or ignored by mainstream Egyptologists.

The hypothesis that the Great Pyramid was mostly underwater some time during its long life is substantiated by the extraordinary fact, not openly discussed by Egyptologists, that at two-thirds of the distance up its faces there is a watermark running around all four surfaces of the structure. It is informative to note that the adjoining Pyramid of Khephren is devoid of a similar watermark, revealing that whatever caused the staining on the Great Pyramid occurred before Khephren's Pyramid was built.

Interestingly, the surviving higher-level white casing stones on Khephren's Pyramid are irregular, jagged, thin and ill-fitting, and reveal an inferior construction in comparison to the substance of the adjoining Great Pyramid. Also of importance is the fact that the casing stones of Khephren's Pyramid are not adorned with "celestial spheres" and other striking information as were those of the Great Pyramid.

Lost knowledge of Earth's future

Sadly, in the 12th century, the entire 22 acres of white casing stones were stripped from the faces of the Great Pyramid to provide masonry for Cairo's mosques and fortifications. With their removal went the "secrets of the Heavens ... the history and chronicles of past times ... and that which is to come", once displayed for all to see upon the faces of the great white "walls of records" (E. Guimet, True Chronicles, c. 1480, tome xvii, p. 41, from older manuscripts, published by Bibliotheca Alexandrina).

That information was inscribed in stone when Egypt "had gods and goddesses for its rulers, who dwelt on Earth with the indigenous, one god always being supreme above the rest" (The Histories).

At the time of the desecration of the Great Pyramid (c. 1100s), it was recorded that there were:

"... eighteen pyramids on the Gizeh Plateau ... each of the pyramids was consecrated to a star ... a few of them are in steps or stages, but most of them have an inclined continuous form, and a smooth surface ... they were originally erected in consequence of the stars foretelling the deluge ... they contained every sort of charm and talisman ... many of the pyramids were destroyed by Karakousch ... who built, with the materials, Kela Gebel [the Citadel], the walls of Cairo, and the causeway with arches near Gizeh ... those that remained contained dangerous passages, some of which communicated with the Fayoum" [south of Cairo, where once stood the famous 1,500-room marbled "Labyrinth" and a "huge pyramid with carved figures of animals upon its surfaces" (The Histories)].

(Makrizi [or Al-Maqrizi], an Egyptian historian [1364–1442], from Manuscript No. 671 in Uri's Catalogue; extracts passim from pp. 92-97 of Dr A. Sprenger's translation in Ouvaroff's Egyptian Mysteries, 1849 edition)

Makrizi's reference to "eighteen pyramids" in northern Egypt in the 12th century reveals that nine were demolished before Colonel Vyse arrived there in 1837, for in his book, Operations Carried on at the Pyramids of Gizeh in 1837, he provides detailed dimensions of nine pyramids then standing on the plateau. Today there are only three.

This is Nicholas Roerich's painting of the damaged, inscribed, stepped temple now called the Sphinx. Roerich shows it devoid of its front legs and paws, possibly revealing that they were not original but built later (maybe during the Roman occupation of Egypt). © Museum of Oriental Art, Moscow

The strange temple on the Giza Plateau

The Great Pyramid was not the only inscribed structure on the Giza Plateau, for codicils attached to the Camoos of Firazabadi provide this intriguing information:

"Below the south-east slant of the big Pyramid is a long Temple with a roaring lion-headed monster formed of stone sitting high up on its front ... its purpose is to fend off misfortune coming from the stars ... it is dreadful to behold, and everything connected to it is mysterious ... it excites the astonishment of all beholders ... it is called Balhouyah Balbit [Great Barabi] by the common people ... it steps squarely up in stages all around; it is inclined upwards and backwards ... its summit is flat, with space for ninety camels to rest [1,800 square feet?] ... it has a secret door that leads to chambers ... engraved on the upward [vertical] faces are inscriptions of stars, spheres and medical treatises."

(Camoos of Firazabadi, passim)

This is an ancient description of the Sphinx in its original, lion-headed form, its name never being "Sphinx" until after the Greeks conquered Egypt in the fourth century BCE. At this ancient stage in its existence, its appearance was so feared that the Arabs called the monument Abu al-Hol ("the Father of Terror") (The Manuscript of Abu al-Hol, Bibliotheca Alexandrina).

Renowned Russian author, researcher and painter Nicholas K. Roerich (1874–1947) lived for many years in Tibet, where he admitted to having "unearthed the hidden treasures of Egypt in a Tibetan monastery" (archival material used in the development of the Roerich Pact). In 1939, he provided a rendition of his unique knowledge of what the Sphinx originally was, and for some reason he presented his painting mirror-reversed. In a subtle, fudged manner, he depicts the lion head looking upwards through ferocious eyes and a large, aggressive, open mouth with sharp, protruding teeth.

Did Earth capture the Moon in a cosmic upheaval?

It is now generally accepted that the original lion head was re-carved in pharaonic times, and the fundamental stepped format of the Sphinx was also reshaped later, maybe by water erosion from centuries of waves lapping against its surfaces by receding flood waters. Exactly when this great cataclysm occurred in world history is not known, but it is possible to provide an opinion by introducing the folklore of other ancient races.

Legends among African tribes, Easter Islanders, southern Greeks, Mexicans and South Americans, including the Colombian Indians of the high savannahs, consistently maintain that a "great catastrophe befell the Earth before the Moon shone in the skies" (Harold T. Wilkins, Mysteries of Ancient South America, Rider & Co., London, 1946; also see H. S. Bellamy, Built Before the Flood, Faber & Faber, London, 1943; Immanuel Velikovsky, Worlds in Collision, Macmillan, 1950). Existing temple inscriptions support that view, and ancient Arabic, Tibetan, Indian and Siberian records tell of the existence of secret subterranean chambers bearing inscriptions which reveal that the Moon has not always lit the night sky.

In the introduction to an ancient sacred writing (the Kangyur) titled "Comments from a Lama", purportedly written in "heavenly letters" by a delog (an advanced lama), there are records from around 4000 BCE of the existence in past times of a "purple city [Shambhala?] set amidst greenery in Thibet", a people called "extractors of consciousness" and, importantly for our thesis, "Earth without a moon".

Author H. S. Bellamy advanced the theories of Hans Hoerbiger, an earlier author on the topic of a moonless Earth, and extended the view that a planet, named Luna, in our solar system was "captured" by the Earth's gravitational pull and became its present satellite, the Moon. In the opinion of those erudite authors (Bellamy and Hoerbiger), this cosmic event began thousands of years ago and its devastating effects eventually "caused the draining of the Mongolian Sea" (Built Before the Flood). This tremendous flood of water poured into the Black Sea and broke through the Bosphorus, creating what is today the Mediterranean Sea. That body of water swelled to a level far higher than that seen today, and this theory provides an explanation for how the watermark came into being around the upper levels of the Great Pyramid.

As can be imagined, these events, coupled with climate changes, could have seriously altered the face of the globe. The wrenching, twisting and turning of the Earth in this gargantuan cosmic upheaval from Luna's effect could have caused some areas to sink (Atlantis?) and mountains to rise (the Himalayas?).

If we consider that some centuries passed before Luna settled down in its new orbit as our Moon, and that during that time the ebbs and flows it created caused violent paroxysms of the Earth with tidal waves and eruptions that harassed the bemused survivors, all this turmoil gave the Moon a bad reputation and a connection with evil. Thus, "Sin became the name of the Babylonian Moon-god", which people of the time believed presided over (or lived within) that luminary (Dictionary of the Bible, edited by James Hastings, DD, 1914, p. 863). At one stage, the Moon was called "Lord Moon" (Deus Lunus in Latin), and its birthday was celebrated on 25 December because that was the day it was first seen in the sky (Camoos of Firazabadi).

It is easy to understand the scepticism of an intelligent reader who may find it difficult to believe that the Moon may not have always been our satellite, but there are numerous legends and lingering memories among many nations that Venus, not the Moon, once shone brightly down on the Earth.

REMARKABLE DISCOVERIES WITHIN THE SPHINX.

Diagrammatic view of the discoveries recently made of hidden temples within the Sphinx.

Repeated reports are coming from Egypt of the extreme interest which is being evoked by the remarkable discoveries now being made by Professor G. A. Reisner, Egyptologist, of Harvard University. He is unveiling a series of hidden temples within the natural rock of which the Sphinx is formed. The drawing above is only approximate in its details as the measured drawings now being made by the explorer are not yet available. The temples and stairways are, however, shown in their relative positions. Not only is the head of the Sphinx occupied by two small chambers, one superimposed above the other, but the actual body of the Sphinx is also occupied by a larger pillar-lined temple with passages leading off in several directions. The actual tomb of Menes, the great but mysterious founder of remote Egypt, is also supposed to be within the Sphinx. The most remarkable discoveries may be looked for at any time.

After 40 years of dedicated research into the history of the ancient Mexican people, Harold T. Wilkins wrote: "It is curious that the ancient Mexicans spoke of the planet Venus as lighting the Eastern Skies, and not the Moon."

(Mysteries of Ancient South America)

In the first century of the current era, renowned historian and naturalist Pliny the Elder (23–79 CE) recorded in Natural History (c. 77) that a great flood once occurred on Earth that was caused by the change of Venus's colour, size, shape and orbit.

The ancient Book of Enoch narrates that a massive deluge on Earth was caused by a pole shift, saying that "the Earth became inclined, and destruction approached" (1 Enoch 65:1). It is certain from modern scientific studies that there was a major catastrophe maybe some 5,500 or more years ago.

But what about the future? What can we learn from the pyramid prophecies? To answer those questions, we refer to some intriguing ancient records.

Ancient prophecies of coming cataclysm

It must be considered that if the future can be accurately predicted, then it must already exist—and this brings us to the Temple Dialogues, a summary of prophecies left by the gods and goddesses of Egypt. This document was found in the Rare Books Collection at the Bibliotheca Alexandrina and was recently translated into English. The prophecies it records may have been originally sourced from inscriptions of "that which is to come, and of every future event" once chronicled upon the faces of the Great Pyramid (ibid.). It is an assemblage of 49 celestial prophecies that Egyptian priests preserved in their libraries, and it discloses that Planet Earth is moving towards a new period of great consequence, one that the gods and goddesses foresaw thousands of years ago.

The prophecies of the wise sages of Shambhala, a mythical mystical city in northern Tibet, say that "a New Era begins amidst thunder and lightning" (Agni Yoga, transmitted to Nicholas and Helena Roerich, 1929, p. 277), but what is it that could evoke such a cosmic epoch?

It is said in the Temple Dialogues that an "astronomical body" is to flare up in our solar system "[w]hen the Sun and Moon, ... Tishya, and the planet Jupiter are in one mansion". According to orientalists, Tishya is one of the stars of the constellation of Cancer (G. N. Roerich, Izbranniye Trudy ["Selected Works"], Moscow, 1967). Thus, the gods and goddesses foresaw a catastrophic time for Planet Earth when this star is in conjunction with the Sun, the Moon and Jupiter.

It may only be coincidence, but in ancient Chinese and Tibetan astrology Tishya is the name of one of 72 malevolent stars and has the ominous meaning of "Earth's executioner" (E. T. C. Werner, A Dictionary of Chinese Mythology, New York, 1961). The significance of the number 72 in ancient tradition is thought to have originated with the 72 associates of Seth, who were involved in the assassination of his brother, Osiris, husband of the great Egyptian goddess Isis, "Queen of Heaven" (The Histories).

They were members of the Company of Gods mentioned earlier [see part one]. We also know that there are 72 coded words in the Book of Exodus, and here we find that identical number used in ancient Tibetan lore. The interpretation of the word "Tishya" may be questioned by Sanskrit scholars, but one thing can be said with certainty: Tishya is an ancient name for a star or a comet. There is a curious passage in a visionary Tibetan book, the Epoch of Maitreya, which confirms Egyptian and other prophecies about an unwelcome incoming stellar body. Under the captivating heading "The Science of Cycles", this reference is found:

"The stars are manifesting a new era. The cosmic fire is again approaching the Earth. Again humanity will be tested to see if the Spirit has progressed sufficiently ... and waves shall wash away the dwellings of the unworthy ... there will be lightning, thunder and star showers."

(Epoch of Maitreya, Dunhuang collection, British Library)

This is a photograph of an untranslated papyrus scroll that is part of the Temple Dialogues. It is possible that it was written in the stepped Sphinx Temple at Giza.
© Bibliotheca Alexandrina

This prophecy is strikingly similar to Apache predictions of a "red sky that lingers for a week" ("Night of the Red Sky", NEXUS, vol. 7, no. 1).

Even the massive trans-Himalayan plateau of Tibet is predicted to be "washed with moving waters, presumably tidal waves" during this period (Andrew Tomas, Shambhala: Oasis of Light, Sphere Books, London, 1977, p. 164).

This flood, as foreseen, is to be accompanied by fiery eruptions, earthquakes and hurricanes, and the cataclysm will spread to such an extent that entire populations will be displaced to other areas.

Under the heading "Crushing the Spiders of Greed", the Temple Dialogues maintains that this period of chastisement will last 49 days, its celestial purpose being to systematically purge the world of hatred, war, falsehoods, superstitions, moral corruption, greed and materialism. It seems that those vices are responsible for the polluted mental atmosphere of which Indian mystics speak worriedly. If we accept the Egyptian prophecies as documented, then it is evident that an approaching era of great significance is forthcoming, the keynote of its cause being the lack of spiritual ascent amongst the human race.

In the early 1880s, the illustrious Mahatma Koot-Hoomi (K. H.), a prophetic sage of Tibet, wrote a letter to British journalist A. P. Sinnett in which he described a "Raja-sun" approaching from beyond Jupiter but as yet is hidden from view. He noted:

"...no mortal physical eye has ever seen it during this, our Round [a regular cycle?] ... In its present position in space, imperceptibly small though it be, the metallic substances of which it is mainly composed are expanding and gradually transforming themselves into aeriform fluids..."

(Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sinnett from the Mahatmas M. and K. H., Frederick Stokes Co. Publishers, New York, 1924, Letter XXIIIB, p. 167)

This may pour light on the mystery of the "astronomical body" and the "cosmic justice" that the Temple Dialogues says await mankind and which, in Eastern thought, are deemed as the retribution of a collective world karma.

If these events are to occur, or are to be repeated in a long, natural cycle, will there be early signs? Mother Shipton (Ursula Sontheil, 1488–1561) predicted that a world catastrophe would be preceded by "a light in the sky" (Mother Shipton's Prophecies after the most exact copy of 1641, Yorkshire, 1989).

Interestingly, in 2004, a 400-metre-wide asteroid was sighted a great distance from Earth by astronomers, who labelled it "2004 MN4". In 2005, it was renamed "99942 Apophis", after an Egyptian serpent god, and it continues to be observed for the expected close passage past the Earth in 2036.

The disturbing prophecies of Merlin end dramatically with a vision of the goddess Ariadne changing the cosmic order of things by causing "Venus to forsake her appointed circuits", creating a new reality (Geoffrey of Monmouth, The Prophecies of Merlin, adapted from the translation in R. J. Stewart, Merlin: The Prophetic Vision and Mystic Life, Penguin Arkana, 1994). This is fascinating, because nearly 2,000 years ago Pliny the Elder noted that a great flood once occurred on Earth because Venus had changed its orbit.

Maybe a natural universal cycle is in operation, and consideration should be given to the possibility that Venus may one day reinstate itself to where it was before the Great Pyramid was built. If so, the Moon would then necessarily escape the Earth's gravitational pull and return to its earlier orbit. In this scenario, Venus would then again light the night sky.

In trying to provide an impossible answer on a dating of a predicted cosmic crisis, we turn to Tibetan advice of what to watch for as a warning of a terrestrial emergency. Called the "Sacred Sign", it is found in the Mahatma Letters, and this forecast takes us back to Egypt:

"When the Great Barabi [ancient name of the Sphinx] of Giza sounds his warning, prepare for great changes."

(Mahatma Morya, Mahatma Letters, quoted in Passport to Shambhala, West Siberia Geographical Society, 1923, Letter 58, p. 79)

That warning might come tomorrow or a thousand years from now. Maybe the Sphinx's head will drop off or its back will collapse in upon itself. In all seriousness, we shouldn't take these prophecies too solemnly, for hundreds of past predictions about the end of the world have not been fulfilled. Maybe we should simply accept the logic of the famous American cartoonist Charles M. Schulz, creator of the Peanuts comic strip, who said: "Don't worry about the world coming to an end today. It is already tomorrow in Australia!" ∞

CROP CIRCLES OF 2008

During the summer in England, the fields were graced with beautiful, precision-made crop formations, one of them apparently depicting planetary positions for the December 2012 northern winter solstice.

Fads come and go and mysteries rise and subside, but, despite the constant attacks from sceptics or damage from plain media ignorance, against all the odds the crop circle phenomenon somehow continues to entrance its devotees after all these years.

From simple circles in lonely fields in the earlier years to the sudden explosion of complex glyphs and subsequent wide public fascination in 1990, the development of this never less than intriguing puzzle has seen the rise and fall of many design genres and styles, but always there has been a sense of a constant, slow progression of evolution towards...something.

The dismissive view that all works of this mystery are merely human art (inevitably one still fostered by the usual dedicated debunkers) is countered in too many cases with evidence biological, statistical and geometrical that suggests something else at work outside the mundane. Whatever the case, the fact remains that, whether one believes the circles are patterns of nature, projections of collective consciousness by physical or metaphysical means or intelligent encoded communications from a great beyond, the view that the crop formations are heralds of some coming time of huge change, perhaps connected to the many predictions now surrounding the year 2012, has come to predominate the scene. But with that message now rightly or wrongly successfully lodged in so many minds, the phenomenon has seemingly reached some kind of plateau, as if it has done the bulk of its set-up work and is now biding its time to await either closure or the dawning of something even more momentous than spectacular glyphs.

An enthusiastic response

Last year I described the crop formations of 2007 as a "holding operation", a consistent supply of beautiful yet not shockingly groundbreaking designs which kept the faithful happy and continued to bring a modest influx of new enthusiasts into an awareness of something very curious going on in their world. I also suggested that 2008 was likely to be much the same, and that has turned out to be a fair prediction.

This season has seen another run of ambitious and striking formations but without any major developments, yet still offering plenty of crowd-pleasing elements. And please the crowds it did, with the crop circle phenomenon enjoying a surprisingly high profile in its UK heartlands (in contrast to 2006, when the press and its readers seemed inexplicably convinced the circles were dying away) and a seeming resurgence of buoyant enthusiasm firing up its aficionados.

The annual crop circle coach tour of the longest-running circle-related gathering, the Glastonbury Symposium, had more subscribers than ever before. Meanwhile, the rejuvenated Silent Circle at Compton Bassett in Wiltshire—once the crop circle-themed cafe at Cherhill and now reborn in a new venue next to The White Horse Inn as a shop and information point—was a constant hive of activity. It saw a steady stream of visitors each day of the summer and held many well-attended lectures. Indeed, Silent Circle is now the first port of call for most Wiltshire circle adventurers keen to get a reasonably unbiased assessment of the latest wonders and the informed fine detail on how to find them (see www.silentcircle.co.uk).

The season unfurls

The 2008 season began near Avebury on 19th April with a straightforward but attractive sixfold wheel in rapeseed, but the raised profile of the phenomenon was helped enormously on 1st June by the arrival of the first majorly significant formation of the year. Lying below the ancient hill fort of Barbury Castle, the perfectly ratcheted spiral in green barley was a more complex echo of the spiral incorporated into the famous triangular pictogram at the same location way back in 1991. This time, however, it embodied perfectly the mathematical principles of π (the ratio of the circumference of a circle to its diameter)—something very unlikely to occur by chance or without perfect precision of placement, and something which even the UK newspapers couldn't ignore. Several papers featured the thoughts of retired US astrophysicist Michael Reed, who made the following impressive observation, as reported by Earthfiles.com and Crop Circle Connector:

"The ratcheting arcs starting at the centre and proceeding outward express π as increments of a circle divided into tenths, or 36 degrees. If you proceed outward from the centre, the multiples of 1/10 of a rotation (including the small circle as a decimal) are 3.141592654..."

This development was mostly reported, unusually, without the traditionally sneering "humorous" tones of the media that tend to accompany remarkable formations and instead bore tones of almost begrudging respect. The observations of an astrophysicist took cerealogy (the study of crop circles) back within the sphere of the officially approved scientism that grips the mainstream, just for one day at least, and therefore propelled it into the limelight. As a result, general interest in the circles rose a little and added to the curiously heightened excitement within the "croppie" community in 2008.

Although nothing quite this mathematically significant was to follow, the fields of Wiltshire were then gifted with an eclectic mix of emblems and mandalas throughout the next few weeks, the best of which were perhaps the "wheel hub" at The Ridgeway, near Avebury, on 15th June and the elaborate, huge design at Furze Knoll on 20th June.

July, however, saw the second most talked about formation of the year with the arrival of a very sharply rendered and astronomically themed nest of thin rings and circles near Avebury Manor on 15th July. It didn't take long for croppies to realise it was a diagram of our own solar system, with all the planets shown in the positions they will take on 21st December 2012—the winter solstice believed by some to herald the arrival of the "great shift" anticipated by several ancient cultures around the world, most notably the Maya. Although some of the planets were very slightly misplaced from their expected positions (which in itself caused debate about coming orbital perturbations amongst some, and about artistic inaccuracy in the more cynical), the message seemed nonetheless clear that we were being reminded of ancient time cycles which might impinge on our civilisation very soon. As just the latest in a line of crop formations to refer directly to the 2012 time cycle, it reinforced to many the idea that we are being called to readiness for that...something just around the corner.

Not content to stop there, July continued to produce a stream of interesting glyphs, at least two of which were truly stunning. A line of three tail-to-tail "swallow" shapes which arrived at Alton Priors on 22nd July then performed the old trick of metamorphosis by turning into the astonishing sight of a whole larger flock of them on the next night, with a beautifully smooth crop-lay inside. Then, on 27th July, a field at Wayland's Smithy in Oxfordshire played host to an enormous complex of hundreds of large and small circles, looking like some kind of celestial game of Solitaire and crying out for some kind of decoding by the educated faithful.

Multifaceted designs

August brought its own surprises. A triple-windmill-type design at Shrivenham, Oxfordshire, on 1st August seemed to be an obscure comment on the adjacent wind farm, perhaps calling attention to the current arguments raging in the UK about the pros and cons of wind power and its effect on the visual environment.

A very literal rendition of a multifaceted gemstone at Yatesbury, Wiltshire, on 3rd August was perhaps the most unusual entry of the month, while a huge figure-of-eight of tailed circles back at the old haunt of Alton Barnes (amongst several other formations this season) was notable for appearing on 8/8/08. In fact, this was the only significant cerealogical event to occur on 8th August—after many unfulfilled Internet predictions of amazing things which otherwise didn't materialise, based on the supposed predictive symbolism of the preceding weeks and the neatness of the digits.

Perhaps the most beautiful design to appear in August had a Celtic-Christian flavour in the shape of a huge crucifix of graceful curves and lines at Etchilhampton, Wiltshire, on 15th, raising some religious speculation (although many other faiths have also been referenced over the years).

August provided a few more complex designs, tailing itself with a very striking star shape at Etchilhampton on 31st. Formations have continued into September (at the time of writing), perhaps because of late harvests due to wet weather—the latest to date appearing at Avebury on 7th, comprising a complex mandala rather like a Chinese puzzle.

As ever, much of the activity was based in Wiltshire this season, although some other atypical counties such as Suffolk, Cornwall and North Yorkshire did produce the occasional single circle or simple design. There was even a grand surprise at Barton Le Clay in Bedfordshire on 14th August, with a very clear-cut mandala worthy of the very best. However, Kent and Sussex, both circle hotspots once, lay bereft.

In amongst the masterpieces of the season, there were some less-impressive examples—of course, some clearly being messy doodles and others being more ambitious but flawed in their layout, demonstrating probable human error and notable signs of stem damage inside. But in the absence of firm evidence in either direction, as always it is up to individuals to make up their own minds as to the proportion of formations that are man-made (as some surely are) and those that are from that unreachable somewhere else. The lesson in discernment would appear to be part of the equation.

Foreign formations and English domination

According to the website www.cropcircleconnector.com, the UK, with 68 formations this summer (at the time of writing), was slightly up on 2007, the second year running of rising occurrences. Meanwhile, the rest of the world seemed slightly down in numbers but still came up with around 50 confirmed reports.

second to the UK) effectively tied on numbers this year, both with their own mix of sublime and less sublime designs. Switzerland, which has been a growing presence in the circle tables, managed to produce six interesting formations this year, and even France, not usually a circle-oriented country, recorded five. Other nations to report a few circles included the USA, Canada, The Netherlands, Poland, the Czech Republic and even South Korea, which came up with a massive and breathtaking pattern to rival many of its English cousins.

Nonetheless, the UK is clearly the centre of circular activity and seems set to remain so.

Much speculation has been made over the years as to why the fields of the UK—and England in particular—have so much to say, while other countries remain muted. Theories range from the geological to the philosophical, with some believing that the UK is the "heart chakra" of the world and that its people are for some reason the most suited to receive this type of universal wake-up call and help take it out to the world.

Accusations of misplaced patriotism aside, with all the 2012 expectations growing it is certainly interesting that the United Kingdom will draw massive attention to itself in holding the Olympic Games in London that year, and even astrologically it seems that its profile will be raised hugely in what may be a momentous but difficult period for the nation (a highly interesting article on this subject, by astrologer Helen Sewell, can be found at www.diagnosis2012.co.uk/astro.html).

Perhaps, with all the mystifying and spectacular symbolism we have been seeing in the UK over the decades, the circle phenomenon is drawing our attention to the fact that, this time around in the ancient cycle, it is in places like the UK—such a prominent example of western culture—where the work has the most to be done. Whether this turns out to be a blessing or a curse remains to be seen, but, for many, the reception of so many awe-inspiring and life-changing gifts in the crops over the decades will have been a price worth paying. ∞

by Philip Coppens © 2008

In the mid-1990s, German author and tour guide Hartwig Hausdorf reignited the debate as to whether aliens had crash-landed in their craft in the remote mountainous region of Baian-Kara-Ula, in China's Qinhai Province. Over the past decade or so, several elements of the story have been confirmed.

The alleged crash-landing at Baian-Kara-Ula has become known as "the Chinese Roswell"—though the crash, if there was one, occurred not in 1947 or thereabouts but thousands of years ago.

At the core of the story is that in 1937–38, an expedition led by Chi Pu Tei, an archaeologist with the Chinese Academy of Sciences in Peking (Beijing), was trying to find shelter in the Kunlun-Kette mountain chain. The team members entered a cave and found inscriptions on the walls. At the back of the cave they found several tombs, aligned in a row, containing strange-looking skeletons, each measuring 1.2 metres in length and having an abnormally large skull. Buried with the skeletons were unusual stone discs, 716 in all, about 30 centimetres wide and 1.0 cm deep with a hole in the centre, each bearing strange hieroglyphs. Were these Stone Age long-playing records?

The story goes that the Chinese Academy of Sciences tried to ban the publication of these findings, but eventually the story of the Dropa (or Dzopa) tribe and their stone discs was released—though never confirmed.

There are several aspects to this story: the strange skeletons; the discovery of a little-known tribe of dwarf-like beings; the nature and whereabouts of the discs; and the decipherment of the inscriptions.

The script was apparently only deciphered and the passages translated in the early 1960s by a team led by Professor Tsum Um Nui of the Peking Academy of Prehistory. He claimed that they describe the crash of an extraterrestrial spacecraft 12,000 years ago. Here are a few lines from the translation:

The Dropa came out of the clouds in their aeroplanes. Before sunrise, our men, women and children hid in the caves ten times. When they finally understood the sign language of the Dropa, they realised the newcomers had peaceful intentions...

As for the discs, it has been pointed out that stone discs are a known ingredient of Chinese culture and are called "Bi" discs. Although their origin is unknown, these Bi discs have been dated to as far back as 10,000 BCE—thus largely coinciding with the time-frame of the alleged crash.

Bi discs were normally made from jade or other precious materials and were regarded as status symbols. In the aftermath of war, the losers were required to hand over their discs as a sign of submission. Furthermore, it is known that the discs were used in burials. In aristocratic burials, the discs were normally placed above the head, below the feet and on the chest of the deceased. Interestingly, Bi discs were often considered to be "the Ear of Heaven", and sometimes the hole in the disc was placed in front of the mouth so that the dead could speak to their ancestors.

The story that stone discs with hieroglyphs were found in a tomb is therefore not only plausible but likely—considering, too, that Bi discs often carried inscriptions.

In 1974, a tourist, Austrian engineer Ernst Wegerer, saw and photographed several discs in the Banpo Museum in Xian, in Shensi Province. But this begs the question of whether these discs, which are similar in description to those reportedly discovered in Baian-Kara-Ula, were "just" Bi discs or actual examples of the ones found in the mountain cave during the 1937–38 expedition.

Descendants of the Dropa

Many people incorrectly believe that the story of the Dropa tribe was first aired in a 1978 book titled Sungods in Exile, edited by David Agamon. This book details the 1947 expedition of the English scientist Dr Karyl Robin-Evans, who supposedly reached the Baian-Kara-Ula mountains and made contact with the Dropa. According to the book, the tribe comprised several hundred members, all dwarfish in appearance and four feet (1.22 metres) tall on average. Dr Robin-Evans stayed there for half a year, learned the Dropa's language and was introduced to the history and traditions of the dwarfish beings, who told him that their ancestors had come from Sirius, of all places.

It is now known that the book was largely science fiction dressed up as non-fiction, but many people had already decided that the Dropa story was bogus—especially those who erroneously argue that the book was the first to mention the "ridiculous" story.

It would seem that Sungods in Exile either was meant to cash in on stories about the Dropa that were in circulation for a few years before it was published, or—if you like a conspiratorial explanation—was meant to discredit the story. Why?

Perhaps it was merely because China was a communist nation and any interest in things Chinese was officially discouraged at the time by western governments.

But it was definitely not a hoax—at least not one executed in 1978. The Berlin-based historian Dr Jörg Dendl has been able to trace the first mention of the Dropa story to 1962, when a monthly magazine for vegetarians, Das vegetarische Universum ("The Vegetarian Universe"), published an article titled "UFOs in Prehistory?" in its July edition. Dr Dendl has so far not been able to find the original Chinese or Japanese source, but it is clear that the story is much older than 1978.

Furthermore, the story reported in Sungods in Exile of an expedition coming across dwarfish people in the Baian-Kara-Ula region has non-fictional counterparts. Dr Dendl found a 1933 clipping about a Chinese confrontation with dwarflike beings. Though some might argue that the location was in "Tibet", at that time Baian-Kara-Ula was mistakenly labelled as being part of Tibet. The article relates how a woman, only 1.2 metres tall, was seen being escorted by Chinese soldiers and that she and her group were being held as slaves. There was also a statement that they were cannibals, but this might merely have been an excuse to cover for their inhumane treatment.

Most importantly, the existence of the Dropa—or a tribe like them—has been confirmed. In November 1995, the Associated Press (AP) stated that some 120 "dwarfish beings" had been discovered in Sichuan Province, in a so-called "Village of the Dwarfs". (Some sceptics cast doubt on the AP account, though it is easily verifiable. In fact, on 9 November 1995, the German publication Bild ran a report titled "Das Dorf der Zwerge – Umweltgifte schuld?" ["The Village of the Dwarfs – environmental pollution to blame?"]) The tallest adult in this village was three foot 10 inches (1.15 m) tall; the smallest was two foot one inch (63.5 cm) tall.

The location of the village is only a few hundred kilometres from the Baian-Kara-Ula mountain range. However, despite China's becoming more open, this entire area including the village remains off limits to foreigners.

Hartwig Hausdorf, who has been on the track of the Dropa since at least the early 1990s, ponders whether in recent years the Dropa's descendants might have abandoned the mountains and settled in the nearby lowlands—where they were "discovered" in 1995.

According to a report in Bild on 27 January 1997, a Chinese ethnologist claimed that the tribe's dwarfism was due to a high concentration of mercury in the soil, which had poisoned their drinking water for several generations. The claim did not go unchallenged, however. Dr Norbert Felgenhauer of the Munich Institute of Toxicology argued that this theory is nonsense. He stated that such poisoning would result in immediate death, not stunted growth, and introduced as evidence the case of the Japanese town of Minamata, where in the 1960s many inhabitants died from mercury poisoning. He also noted that mercury was unable to change human DNA and hence could not be held responsible for causing an hereditary trait—one that was clearly apparent in this tribe.

Deciphering the Discs

So, we know that the existence of stone discs is possible, if not likely, and that, if the 1933 report is correct, there were dwarfish people living in that region. The question, then, is this: is the decipherment of the script correct? If it is, then it does not necessarily prove that alien beings crash-landed in China, but at the very least it shows that these "genetically bizarre" beings believed they were descendants of aliens.

According to the story, in 1962 a team of five scientists from the Peking Academy of Prehistory, led by Professor Tsum Um Nui, managed to decipher the inscriptions. Despite the claims made in the translation, the scientists eventually published their findings. Professor Um Nui then apparently was forced (or he decided) to abandon his position, after which he returned to his native Japan, where he died shortly afterwards. Though little is known about what happened next, Hausdorf underlines that, in 1966, the Cultural Revolution began—and, as with all such revolutions, much was lost forever.

There is no verification of the 1962 translation as such, though it should be pointed out that there is no evidence in the camp that argues it's all a hoax to suggest that the 1962 story and the translation are invented.

So far, the best the detractors have been able to argue is that the story is improbable (of course!) and that no one has ever been able to decipher a stand-alone language, let alone an extraterrestrial language. That is true. But nowhere does the account say, and no one has ever argued, that this was a "unique language".

The only claim in this connection is that in 1937–38, when the discs were discovered, their inscriptions could not be read immediately. Only in 1962 did a team of specialists succeed in this task. For all we know, the language in which the script was written had not yet been deciphered in 1937, or no one had paid sufficient attention to the inscriptions, or only in 1962 was someone able to identify the language in which the inscriptions were written.

But note the year: 1962. This is the year that the earliest known reference to the story appeared—found by Dr Dendl in a German magazine—and it would suggest that something happened in 1962 that made a Chinese or Japanese source report on it.

The translation of the discs might be precisely such an event: Professor Um Nui publishes his translation, the media pick it up and create a controversy; he decides to retire and return to Japan, while the media outside of China also report on it, ending up in the German magazine "The Vegetarian Universe". If the story was invented, it means that it was invented (or misreported) in 1962.

The 1978 Sungods in Exile hoax is now clearly nothing more than a footnote in the story, largely responsible for popularising the entire saga but definitely not for creating or inventing it out of thin air.

The 1962 article also discusses some technical details of the discs, underlining the potential factual nature of the story. It notes that the discs are composed of cobalt, iron and nickel—the only metals to produce a magnetic field. Nickel is found largely in Canada and Central Africa, but in recent years it has been found in China, in the general area where the discs were located.

For Hausdorf, this is a further indication that the story is factual, for this find post-dates the discovery of the discs—and the 1962 article. In short, what in 1962 was unlikely and improbable has now been confirmed.

A New Expedition

Baian-Kara-Ula remains one of China's most remote regions. Its mountains reach as high as 5,000 metres and descend to 2,000 metres. Despite the altitude, summers can be pleasantly warm in this region.

It is now said that a new expedition is being prepared and will soon be under way. It is apparently largely an initiative of Chinese media empires, its main sponsor being the China Daily newspaper. If the participants are able to get their act together, it might not be another decade before this story takes yet another twist. ∞

EX-ASTRONAUT EDGAR MITCHELL SAYS UFOS EXIST

Retired Apollo 14 astronaut Dr Edgar Mitchell, the sixth man to walk on the Moon, went public on Kerrang! Radio in the West Midlands, UK, on 23 July 2008 with his confirmation that UFOs and aliens do exist, that they visit our planet, and that governments have been covering up the truth for at least the last 60 years.

Interviewed by Nick Margerrison, host of The Night Before team, Dr Mitchell assured with this comment: "The amount of misinformation, covert and actual attempts to cover up, seem to be decreasing. I think we're headed for real disclosure by some serious organisations moving in that direction."

A FORMER NASA SPACECRAFT OFFICER ADMITS ETs ARE REAL

by Clark C. McClelland

© July 2008

In support of my friend, courageous US NASA astronaut Edgar Mitchell, Apollo 14:

I, Clark C. McClelland, former ScO [Spacecraft Officer], Space Shuttle Fleet, personally observed an eight-to-nine-foot-tall ET on my 27-inch video monitors while on duty in the Kennedy Space Center [KSC], Launch Control Center (LCC). The ET was standing upright in the space shuttle payload bay, having a discussion with two tethered US NASA astronauts.

I also observed on my monitors the spacecraft of the ET as it was in a stabilised, safe orbit to the rear of the Space Shuttle main engine pods.

I observed this incident for about one minute and seven seconds—plenty of time to memorise all that I was observing. It was an ET and alien starship!

To all who have faith in me, I present you with this artist's concept [overleaf] of what I saw many years ago at KSC. It was a tall creature, about eight to nine feet tall. It had a humanoid body shape with two arms, two hands, two legs, two feet, a slim torso and a normal-sized head for its size. The colour of its skin I could not determine. It appeared to have two, what appeared to be, eyes but it was not detailed enough for any other comments.

How did it communicate? I have no idea. It did move its arms a lot—almost like giving instructions.

I heard no voice communications. The helmet was not as large as [the helmets of] our two NASA astronauts, and had a viewport to look forward. It had a small, perhaps a communication, device attached only to the right side of the helmet.

I saw no oxygen tank(s). It had a wide belt like wrapping around it. It did not appear to be tethered as the two astronauts were to the sides of the shuttle structure. I observed nothing that appeared to be a weapon.

The time [duration] of this amazing scene was one minute and seven seconds. I timed it on my astronaut chronograph watch.

A friend of mine later contacted me and said that this person had also observed an eight-to-nine-foot-tall ET inside the space shuttle crew compartment! Yes, inside our shuttle! Both missions were DoD (Pentagon) Top Secret (TS) encounters.

With my verifiable background, there is no federal government agency that can say I am crazy!

I am a space program pioneer. I assisted in launching the Mercury, Gemini, Apollo, Apollo-Soyuz, Skylab, Space Shuttle and Deep Space missions and the International Space Station.

I have received character

What I know, they would not allow me to publish. I have written at least three books to release the truth to all of the human race. I was on the leading edge of this subject, and I met with many NASA and other astronauts throughout the years that I was involved in military and NASA space programs, i.e., 1958 to 1992. I have heard many experiences of ETs having been seen on the Moon, etc., by NASA astronauts and I relate these and more in my books.

NASA is not a civilian space agency. The Pentagon owns NASA! Some of the DoD (Department of Defense) missions I participated in were Top Secret. Those missions carried TS satellites and other space mission hardware into orbit, where several crews met with ETs! I am ready to tell my story, but for compensation.

Please visit my background page to see documents, awards, certificates, photos—proof of my honourable past in the space industry, the United States space program and with NASA, as well as showing some of the recognition I have received from NASA astronauts.

I have received honoured mentions from US senators, congressmen, military officers and scientists.

(See my website, www.stargate-chronicles.com, for more disclosures.)

In fact, this absolutely verifies what my friend, astronaut Edgar Mitchell, of Apollo 14, has recently and courageously released.

I have launched or witnessed 650 missions so far in my life. I am an expert in visually recognising any craft created and flown by the human race, whether secret or otherwise. I know ET and alien craft when I see them! I was the Director of the NICAP Unit-3 actual "X-Files" at Cape Canaveral and the Kennedy Space Center from 1958 to 1992. Yes, the actual "X-Files"!

Aliens are here! They walk among us. They may be implanted into our various Earth governments.

THE ESSENCE OF WOMAN

by Annie Meredith

Sarah C ete Press, Qld, Australia, 2008
ISBN 978-0-9586373-7-4 (295pp tpb)
Available: www.anniemeredith.com

Woman in all her glory is praised, explained and encouraged in Annie Meredith's sensitive assessment, The Essence of Woman. With 30 years of experience in energy medicine to guide her, Meredith is well equipped to impart practical knowledge and wisdom on the inherent nature of woman. The female principle, she says, permeates a woman's life in her behaviour, physiology, emotions, cognition, expression, relationships and so much more, but it can be better understood when we translate the world and the people around us into energetic terms.

This holistic perspective on a woman's life covers energetic polarities and sexuality (including differences between the sexes and hard-wiring of the brain), pregnancy and birth, puberty, menstruation, motherhood and growing old gracefully. It merges ancient wisdom with new physics and heralds an emerging consensus that we are all interconnected at an energetic level.

Annie Meredith celebrates a woman's nurturing role: by tending to herself, her children, her relationships and the planet, she supports humanity's highest potential. She also explains the seven-year cycles of growth and development that dominate a woman's physical growth and explores how "e-motions" are experienced differently between the sexes. She includes no-holds-barred details for women of any age, answering pressing questions that are often asked in key stages of a life's journey.

CONSCIOUS GARDENING

by Michael J. Roads

Roadsight, Nambour, Australia, 2008
ISBN 978-0-86436-243-8 (288pp tpb)
Available: www.michaelroads.com

Organic gardening exponent, metaphysical teacher and author Michael Roads returns to his gardening passion in his latest book, applying to his already extensive knowledge base the wisdom he's since gleaned about nature and living in harmony with it.

With his gardening books such as A Guide to Organic Living (mid-1970s) and The Natural Magic of Mulch (1989) now being out of print, Roads utilises some of this tried and trusted early material on subjects as diverse as soil analysis, growing organic fruits and vegetables, preparing compost and mulch, and making up natural sprays against marauding insects and animals. He's combined this with his more recent revelations on attuning to the spirit of the land, restoring the soil's energetic signature and appreciating the garden as a metaphor for life.

Roads provides not only a wealth of practical advice for both novice and seasoned gardener, but he shares his enlightened "conscious gardener" observations on companion planting, working with subsoil dynamics, restoring paramagnetic energy and fostering plant communication. He makes the distinction between "being with" and "doing things to" a garden, and suggests that too much focus on thinking rather than connecting intuitively with the natural world is neither workable nor therapeutic. He urges us to make the intuitive a part of our conscious self and put the magic back into gardening by developing a transcendent love for nature.

COMING BACK TO LIFE

by P. M. H. Atwater, LHD

Transpersonal Publishing, NC, USA,
2008 (2nd revised edition)
ISBN 978-0-9557161-0-2 (428pp tpb)
Available: www.TranspersonalPublishing.com

The subject of near-death experiences (NDEs) is gaining in popularity, and Dr Phyllis Atwater is an authority on it, not just for having had her own NDEs (three in 1977) but for interviewing thousands of NDE "survivors" over the years. When her book Coming Back to Life came out in 1988, it was the first in-depth study of NDEs that examined the whole experience including the after-effects, both positive and negative. This classic text is back in a second revised edition (also see review of The Big Book of Near-Death Experiences in 15/03).

Certainly, the NDE can be a transformative experience that changes the individual in many ways—for example, by promoting an enlightened, even ecstatic, attitude to life and living or increasing psychic abilities—but it can also be hellish if no one believes your story, if you feel guilty for returning, or if you feel depressed that you had to leave a beautiful place and resume your former life.

The problem with reintegration is one that Dr Atwater handles with care, and she gives pointers on how to help NDE survivors. She also includes a comprehensive sources and contacts section. From her studies, Dr Atwater concludes that the NDE can be used as a neutral prototype for studying the transformation of consciousness, and that the after-effects of the NDE can be used as a yardstick for measuring authenticity, i.e., it's our response to the experience that makes the difference. Her insights are brain-shifting and profound.

THE DEAD ARE TALKING: Proof of an Afterlife?

by Ross Hemsworth

TGS Publishing, USA, 2007
ISBN n/a (428pp tpb)
Available: UK—www.nowthatsweird.co.uk; USA—www.hiddenmysteries.com; email ross@nowthatsweird.co.uk

Little did Ross Hemsworth realise how much his life would change when, in 1998, he began an interest in paranormal investigations with a newfound photographer friend and established The Phantom or Fraud Project. He set out as a sceptic, yet increasingly he realised that some happenings cannot be explained in scientific or rational terms. He was running a small TV production company in Bedfordshire, England, and eventually did a deal with Lion TV to record a series called The Ghost Detectives (2001).

By 2005, Hemsworth had his own radio show and was considered a "leader in the search for scientific proof of soul survival". He even discovered he had a gift for clairvoyancy, which he then applied in progressing his research work; for example, in orb studies, and his own spiritual development.

In The Dead Are Talking, Hemsworth covers much more than proof of life after death, but even this he peppers with tales of investigating parallel dimensions, communicating with ghosts and receiving taped messages from the departed (the electronic voice phenomenon). No longer a sceptic but one seeking to understand, he explores other paranormal realms such as dowsing for orbs and spirit presences, energy and ley lines, energy vortexes, telepathy, mediumship and the UFO phenomenon. He shares a few tips, too, on how to expand psychic awareness. His storytelling ability makes for an engrossing read.

TOO MANY SECRETS

by Kathleen McErlain

Available: Kathleen McErlain, Box 11,
Southlands Shopping Centre, South
Penrith NSW 2750, Australia, email
kathleenmcerlain@yahoo.com.au

Kathleen McErlain has spent many years researching and piecing together the big picture on the hollow Earth, its subterranean realms and species, and the myths surrounding them. In Too Many Secrets, she presents masses of evidence including testimony from people who have encountered large, populated underground bases built by aliens or in cooperation with humans with the help of advanced technologies. Some of these installations have been around for thousands of years, according to ancient records from Sumerian and Vedic cultures. She also claims that many archaeological sites around the world contain stargates, some of which are still operational. And she includes in her purview the establishment of military bases on Mars and how the Moon came to orbit the Earth.

McErlain introduces the idea that the Babylonian Brotherhood, a secret cabal of powerful families working in cooperation with various alien groups, has ratcheted up its world-domination agenda in recent decades, dotting the world's continents with secret subterranean bases for nefarious purposes. One of their intentions is to subjugate humanity and fulfill an "end-of-the-world style, deliberately orchestrated mass hysteria event" that would do away with any democratic rights we thought we had.

McErlain realises what she says may be shocking and that many people won't believe it. However, the solution as she sees it is to realise our spiritual potential, become self-empowered and short-circuit the agenda of fear and hate being imposed on us by the Illuminati and their puppeteers. Compelling stuff!

THE KINGDOM OF AGARTTHA

by Marquis Alexandre Saint-Yves d'Alveydre

Inner Traditions, Rochester, USA, 2008
ISBN 978-1-59477-268-9 (182pp tpb)
Available: www.InnerTraditions.com

This is the first English-language edition of a book by the French occultist Marquis Alexandre Saint-Yves d'Alveydre (1842–1909). Published in 1886 as Mission de l'Inde en Europe ("Mission of India in Europe"), it didn't see the light of day then because the author destroyed all but one copy, perhaps because, being about the legendary Agarttha, it would likely be subjected to mockery and ridicule.

Saint-Yves, a Christian synarchist who was also involved in political activities and had a bevy of followers including esotericists Papus and, later, René Guénon, apparently obtained much of his information about the mythical kingdom from his "astral spying" forays. A student of Sanskrit in his middle years, Saint-Yves suggested that the name Agarttha means "closed to anarchy" (the opposite of synarchy). He made amazing but unprovable assertions about the sacred kingdom, its location (perhaps beneath the Himalayas), its secret language called Vattan, its spiritual hierarchy headed by Brâhatmah or "the King of the World", and its vast repositories of hundreds of centuries of knowledge in the arts, sciences and wisdom traditions.

This edition's lengthy introduction by mystical musicologist Joscelyn Godwin provides rich historical context.

FORBIDDEN SCIENCE

edited by J. Douglas Kenyon

Bear & Co., Rochester, USA, 2008
ISBN 978-1-59143-082-7 (305pp tpb)
Available: www.BearandCompanyBooks.com

This is the third book in the Forbidden... series compiled by J. Douglas Kenyon from the pages of the US-based bimonthly magazine Atlantis Rising, which he edits. (We reviewed Forbidden History in 12/05 and Forbidden Religion in 14/03.) In the introduction to Forbidden Science, Kenyon explains why the proponents of materialistic reductionist science are wrong in their thinking and are increasingly being supplanted by "new science" visionaries prepared to consider spiritual and metaphysical realms in their understanding of our universe.

All up in this inspiring compendium there are 42 essays from 19 contributors, several of whom are Atlantis Rising regulars (Len Kasten, David Samuel Lewis, Cynthia Logan, Jeane Manning), including Kenyon himself. The expanse covers debunker debunking, high technology of the ancients, new physics challenges, spiritual science, astronomy of cataclysms, energy medicine, paranormal psychology, ET technology, the mind-matter connection and the biology of transcendence.

Among the leading lights featured in or interviewed for these essays are physicist

Tom Bearden (scalar waves), Dr Masaru Emoto (memory of water), David Morehouse (psychic warfare), biologist Dr Rupert Sheldrake (ESP), and Dean Radin, who explores the relationship between physical events and mass human attention—the most amazing "event window" being just prior to 9/11.

A book to rock the orthodoxy!

OTTO RAHN & THE QUEST FOR THE HOLY GRAIL: The Amazing Life of the Real "Indiana Jones" by Nigel Graddon

Adventures Unlimited Press, Kempton, Illinois, USA, 2008
ISBN 978-1-931882-82-8 (380pp tpb)
Available: Aust/NZ—NEXUS offices; Europe—www.frontierbookshop.nl/whois_en.html; USA—www.adventuresunlimitedpress.com

Much speculation surrounds the life of Otto Rahn (1904–1939), particularly during the early 1930s period when he explored the south of France looking for evidence of the Holy Grail. It was at this time that he was identified with Nazis intent on finding sacred objects that would justify their extreme political theories and activate the power of their ancient "Aryan" mythologies. However, author Nigel Graddon, who has been researching Rahn's life for decades, suggests that he was actually a defender of freedom and sought to rekindle humanity's light.

Drawing on the few available historical works, e.g., books by Hans-Jürgen

Lange and Christian Bernadac, and conducting his own interviews with people who knew Rahn, Graddon goes on to posit that Otto Rahn was the real-life model for the fictional Indiana Jones. Philologist, mystic, adventurer and author, Rahn had studied mediaeval texts and deduced that treasures could be found in places like the grottoes of Lombrives in the French Pyrénées.

All sorts of rumours surrounded Rahn, linking him with occult groups and intelligence agencies, and Graddon delves into these, including those concerning his apparent death by suicide in 1939, his life cut so tragically short. Rahn was a man on a mission with a brilliant mind and high ideals to match, though one who left behind no clues that he'd actually found anything of fabulous provenance. Still, a great tale.

SILENT FIELDS: The Growing Cancer Cluster Story by Donna Fisher

Lindlahr Book Publishing, Qld, 2008
ISBN 978-0-646-48743-4 (156pp tpb)
Available: www.silentfields.com

It was the prospect of an electricity substation being installed in her street in Logan City, near Brisbane, Queensland, in 1999 that sparked Donna Fisher to form a residents' action group to fight the energy utility Energex, a large public company, which took the local council and the group to court. But it was the growing incidence of cancer clusters, especially breast cancers among women working at the ABC's Toowong, Brisbane, headquarters which were announced in July 2006, that prompted her to write this book.

In Silent Fields, Fisher tells the story of her fact-finding mission, two rigorous court cases which she headed without a legal team, and a landmark decision that acknowledged that adverse health effects occur in close proximity to electromagnetic fields (EMFs) of as little as 2 milligauss (mG)—not the accepted, outdated Australian threshold of 1,000 mG that really only applies to "gross" or "thermal" effects. Sadly, the substation was allowed to proceed but with strict stipulations, e.g., that the fields emitted were not to exceed 4 mG and only two transformers would be allowed.

Interspersed in the text are details of decades of important scientific studies showing the causal link between the presence of electromagnetic radiation and EMFs and diseases like leukaemia and breast cancer.

Fisher extends her crusade to encompass the worldwide problem of cancer clusters and remains a courageous campaigner for cleaning up the scourge of so-called "dirty electricity".

THE COSMIC PULSE OF LIFE by Trevor James Constable

(revised and updated 4th edition)
ISBN 978-1-58509-115-7 (355pp tpb)
Available: www.thebooktree.com

When the first edition of Trevor James Constable's classic book on UFOs, The Cosmic Pulse of Life, was printed in 1976, it was destroyed in a suspicious fire at the printer's warehouse. The second printing didn't fare much better, many copies being lost in a tanker explosion offshore from the author's garage. Now, here is an updated fourth edition with a new preface from Constable and some new photos.

However, most were taken between 1958 and the mid-1970s and feature infrared images of not just discoid craft but what Constable calls "critters"—huge, living, intelligent, etheric, morphing forms that are prolific in our atmosphere and force us to rethink what constitutes a UFO. They have since been independently corroborated by teams in Italy and Romania as well as by NASA, as the new appendices show.

In trying to understand the phenomenon, Constable turned to the work of philosopher Dr Rudolf Steiner, radionics physician Dr Ruth Drown and orgone energy pioneer Dr Wilhelm Reich, and here he includes his take on their perspectives. Constable went on to become famous in his own right for his "cloudbuster" rainmaking technology and methods (see Science News, 10/05).

Constable was already an aviation historian and prolific author before he wrote his 1958 book They Live in the Sky. His contribution to UFO research was even too far ahead for many early ufologists let alone mainstream scientists, and his well-chosen words still ring true today, highlighting ongoing ignorance, disparagement and official silence on the phenomenon. The Cosmic Pulse... remains a profound thesis that deserves much wider attention.

THE END OF FOOD

by Paul Roberts

Bloomsbury, London, UK, 2008
ISBN 978-0-7475-8881-8 (408pp tpb)
Available: www.bloomsbury.com;
www.allenandunwin.com

We'll be paying a costly price if we don't address the mess that industrialised, globalised food production, distribution and retailing has become, says Paul Roberts in The End of Food.

Author of the bestselling The End of Oil, he argues that despite the fact that the food system has evolved like other economic sectors, food itself is basically not an economic phenomenon and is inherently unsuited to mass production and globalisation. Industrial-scale food production is reaching its limit in terms of supply and is fraught with concerns over health and safety, declining soil quality and water availability, rising costs of energy and inputs, changing climate and increasingly more land being devoted to biofuel production.

In part one, Roberts explores the origins and operations of the food system from our carnivorous beginnings to the first agricultural revolution and on to latter-day industrialisation with its declining nutritional standards and the rise of obesity and diabetes. In the second part he examines the global food trade, the paradox of plenty with the exclusion of a billion hungry mouths, and the conditions that could make a pandemic inevitable. In the final part he looks at ways to resolve these impasses, with reference to encouraging more local or at least regional food production and distribution systems, tackling problems of organic versus transgenic food production and considering political, economic and cultural realities. As consumers, we can do much to demand and promote change for the better.

THE ULTIMATE CONSPIRACY

by James McCumiskey

Literally Publishing Ltd, UK, 2007
ISBN 978-0-9557161-0-2 (428pp pb)
Available: literallypublishing.com

It took the death of his father from liver cancer in 2002 for Belfast-based accountant James McCumiskey to begin to explore the German New Medicine developed by Dr Geerd Hamer in the early 1980s. By 2005, McCumiskey had learned enough to determine that the "biomedical paradigm" is the "ultimate conspiracy". In his view, 95 per cent of modern medicine is both scientifically and medically wrong.

McCumiskey summarises Dr Hamer's hypothesis, including the Iron Rule of Cancer which holds that every cancer or cancer-equivalent disease originates with severe, acute, dramatic biological shock occurring simultaneously on three levels: psyche, brain and organ. It's an emergency response that involves a specific brain-relay mechanism affecting a particular organ, but to overcome it requires resolving the original shock-conflict situation. This first biological law, the most important because it tells why a person gets cancer/disease in the first place, is accompanied by four other laws: that all meaningful biological programs (MBPs) have a conflict-active phase and a reparation phase; that disease symptoms depend on which germ layer the organ is made from; that the types of microbes operating during reparation depend on the germ-layer origin of the organ; and that the MBP is an all-out effort to resolve the shock.

All this information McCumiskey applies to reassessing the modern medicine model, in the process exposing myths and poor science to do with vaccinations, HIV and AIDS, lung cancer and more. By reading his book, you'll understand why fear, so widely encouraged by the medical establishment, is such a dead-end response.

FOOD MATTERS: You Are What You Eat

Available: www.foodmatters.tv

This DVD lays it all on the table:

How we got into our current state of dis-ease and ill health, how our lives are bound up with deleterious conventional agricultural practices around the world, and how we can break free from these bonds.

Food Matters contains interviews with: Dr Ian Brighthope; Phillip Day; Charlotte Gerson, founder of the Gerson Institute; Dr Dan Rogers, Dr Andrew W. Saul; David Wolfe; and Dr Victor Zeines. Food Matters is both dynamic and entertaining—and is capable of convincing anyone of the power of natural foods and holistic therapies before resorting to more doctors, hospitals, surgeries and drugs.

James Colquhoun and Laurentine ten Bosch are to be congratulated for their efforts with this film. It's available on DVD or via streaming over the Internet.

SKULL & BONES: The Catholic Connection

© Anthony J. Hilder, Free World Film Works, 2007

Available: www.freeworldfilmworks.com

A film by Anthony J. Hilder, Skull & Bones features William David Cox, a former seminarian who has spent the past 30 years uncovering the sinister forces behind attacks upon the Catholic faith.

Hilder, as a radio talk-show host, an investigative journalist, a war correspondent and a filmmaker, has done around 17,000 interviews over the past 30 years, working to bring his dream of a free world into being.

Skull & Bones is one of Hilder's most explicit exposés of the Neoconazi cabal that is controlling our currency, our commerce and Christianity.

THE ALCHEMICAL DREAM: Rebirth of the Great Work with Terence McKenna

© Mystic Fire, 2008

Available: www.sacredmysteries.com

In the mid-1990s, Terence McKenna and Mystic Fire's Sheldon Rocklin teamed up to make this rich and exciting film. Little did they know that this would be their last collaboration.

Filmed in Prague, with McKenna portraying his usual erudite rendition of the Irish bard, this beautiful-looking film takes us on a journey into the alchemical renaissance of King Frederick V and his wife, Queen Elizabeth of Bohemia.

Playing the role of John Dee, court magician to Queen Elizabeth I, McKenna shows us how the promise of a return to the tradition of alchemy was almost instituted in Europe. He also shows us that this early attempt to create an alchemical kingdom led to the rise of the European Renaissance, the institution of Cartesian science and the beginning of rationalism within the western mindset.

This is McKenna's finest performance and a worthy eulogy to his genius.

EXTRAORDINARY RENDITION

Distributors: Australia—Fuse Music, tel (02) 9699 7555; UK—Putumayo, tel 07759 600495; USA—

Cumbancha, tel (802) 425 2118, www.cumbancha.com

If you want an "extraordinary" experience, this is your album—a cross between traditional tango, gypsy swing and American folk with some Latin influence thrown in. The band hails from San Francisco and Rupa, also a medical doctor, writes and arranges the songs on this first album. Instruments include cello, accordion, guitar, trumpet, bass and drums. An exciting trip through a dozen world influences with foot-tapping sounds of gypsy mixed with French chanson. An exhilarating album, definitely worth the purchase.

THE MANDE VARIATIONS

by Toumani Diabaté

World Circuit, UK, 2008 (58mins)

Distributors: Aust—Destra, tel (07) 3849 6020; UK—World Circuit, tel 0171 383 4907, website

One of the world's great musicians and the best kora player on Earth, Toumani Diabaté is known for his amazing versatility, having played with the likes of Taj Mahal, Ali Farka Touré and even Björk. His second solo album has traditional Malian pieces, his own compositions and works inspired by groups like UB40. He uses two koras: one over 40 years old with traditional tuning using leather, and a younger one with machine-head tuning. A classic kora album with his unique, interwoven style of mixing bass and melody.

INTRODUCING PERUNIKA TRIO by Perunika Trio

WMN, UK, 2008 (49mins)

Distributors: Aust—The Planet Company, tel (02) 9283 8250; UK—World Music Network, tel 020 7498 5252, www.worldmusic.net; USA—World Circuit, tel 800 955 9588

These three Bulgarian women formed Perunika Trio in London in 2005 after they met through the London Bulgarian Choir. Putting together an album was an emotional journey for them all, as they connected with a centuries-old tradition of vocal harmonies. Perunika Trio explores Bulgarian, Macedonian and Russian folklore with its Slavic origins. The irregular time beats in the music are typical of the Bulgarian folk style. This combined with drone-like harmonisations gives the music its unique flavour. The piercing beauty of a strong tradition comes through powerfully in this album.

Distributors: Aust—Select Audio, tel (02) 8966 3307; USA—Telarc Digital, tel (216) 464 2313, www.telarc.com

This Grammy Award-winning quartet is famous for playing classical guitar and performing its own blend of world and contemporary styles. Of over 12 albums to date, this is the first featuring Brazilian-based material and tributes, inspired by the group's collaborations with Brazilian singer Luciana Souza, Female Jazz Singer of the Year in 2005. It includes a smooth track from Heitor Villa-Lobos, the country's most celebrated classical composer. A very infectious and joyous album.

"How to Meditate INSTANTLY!"

If you'd like to meditate as deeply (actually more deeply) than a Zen monk, literally at the touch of a button, this may be one of the most important messages you will ever read. Here is why...

Based in part on Nobel Prize-winning research on how "complex systems" (human beings, for instance) evolve to higher levels of functioning, a mental improvement program has been created utilising a powerful audio technology called Holosync®.

A precise combination of audio signals gives the brain a very specific stimulus that creates states of deep meditation — and causes the creation of new mind-enhancing neural connections between left and right brain hemispheres.

Now a New CD and Report Reveal ...

- The scientific evidence proving how Holosync® increases the production in the brain of many vital neuro-chemicals that can slow ageing.
- How to achieve super-deep meditation, at the touch of a button.
- How to dramatically reduce stress.

Combating the Codex Alimentarius

currently allows for up to 10 per cent (the highest of any country under Codex) of GMO contamination of organic foods and, amazingly, still allows them to be labelled as "USDA Certified Organic". Some governments, such as the European Union, allow only 0.9 per cent contamination, while others permit merely 0.1 per cent.

However, the FAO and WHO's use of the term "contamination" simply does not describe the GMOs as being mixed in with normal food. This term is also very noteworthy, as most research on the dangers of GMOs can no longer be denied.

The US, of course, vehemently objected to such a designation, but this time to no avail.

Although FAO and WHO have not gone so far as to require mandatory labelling of GMOs, their recognition that GMOs can contaminate food is a huge win for health freedom.

Expanding that requirement to mandatory labelling is the next logical step, but this is still a work in progress.

Take Action against Codex!

The only way to avoid the death-for-profit agenda is to fight back by disseminating knowledge to everyone you know.

It does not matter whether they are still asleep or hypnotised by the enslavement of daily life or too busy to pay attention: the time to wake up is now.

The US government and the collaborating media have been trying to distract the world while all these egregious and mandatory standards are covertly passed.

It is time to take action, and you can do so by going to the website of the Natural Solutions Foundation, which can be found at www.healthfreedomusa.org, and following the latest updates on Codex. You can also sign a legal citizen's petition at the web page http://www.healthfreedomusa.org/index.php?page_id=184.

It is very important that swift and vociferous action be taken now. Times are changing very rapidly, and unless we all come together on this issue we may have to start thinking about growing our own food in the near future to avoid calculated extermination.

Here are more contacts for action against the Codex:

- Australia

You can send an email to the Department of Agriculture and Food in Western Australia or the Minister for Agriculture in your respective state. For example, in WA the email address is enquiries@agric.wa.gov.au.

The Therapeutic Goods Administration can also be contacted online via its website <http://www.tga.gov.au/contact.htm>.

In 1945, a mysterious Nazi secret weapons project code-named "The Bell" left its underground bunker in lower Silesia, along with all its project documentation, and a 4-star SS general. Taken aboard a massive six-engine ultra-long range aircraft, "The Bell," Kammler, and all project records disappeared completely. As a prelude, the SS murdered most of the scientists and technicians involved with the project, a secret weapon that according to one Nobel prize-winning physicist, was given a classification of "decisive for the war," a security classification higher than any other secret weapons project in the Third Reich, including its atomic bomb.

REALM OF THE RING LORDS

by Laurence Gardner

Time-honoured tales of fairies, elves and dragons have long carried a particular fascination which lingers in our collective psyche—a familiar but historical allure which is rooted in the far-distant realm of the Scythian Ring Lords. Dealing with numerous aspects, from Sleeping Beauty to Robin Hood and Count Dracula, the author reveals how a prestigious sovereign heritage has been strategically suppressed by parliamentary and church dictate, facilitated by a forged document which has controlled all monarchical and governmental practices in Western Europe for over 1,200 years.

Paperback: (Code: RORL) $33.00

SUNS OF GOD: Krishna, Buddha and Christ Unveiled

by Acharya S

Over the past several centuries, the Big Three spiritual leaders have been the Lords Christ, Krishna and Buddha, whose stories and teachings are remarkably similar. THE LOST SCIENCE OF MEASURING THE EARTH

by Robin Heath and John Michell
A breakthrough in understanding the system by which prehistoric monuments were designed and placed on the landscape. Michell and Heath show that: * Prehistoric Britons knew the dimensions of the Earth and had undertaken an accurate survey of the British Isles, pre-3000 BC, * The major time periods of the Sun and Moon were encoded within their monuments, measures and system of land surveying. * This prehistoric system was still being applied in the Middle Ages, and remnants survive today.

COLLOIDAL SILVER- THE HIDDEN TRUTHS

by Keith Courtenay
It was only after years of trying to fight off a severe lung disease with antibiotics that Keith Courtenay realised his system was riddled with a chronic Candida yeast infection. In his search for alternatives, Keith stumbled across reference to colloidal silver as a universal germicide, able to kill up to 650 disease-causing micro-organisms including bacteria, viruses, fungi and yeasts. He was surprised to find much early 20th-century literature about the efficacy of colloidal silver in medicine, and learnt that, with the introduction of antibiotics, its use was superseded and research was halted until the 1970s.
